Almighty God, whose throne is the heavens and who dwellest not in houses made with hands, but seeketh the humble and contrite heart as a dwelling-place, we thank Thee that Thou hast deigned to manifest Thyself to Thy people in so many ways. We thank Thee for the privilege of pub ic wor-ship and the gathering of Thy people and for the house of God in which we may meet and join together in prayer and praise. As we love Thee and appreciate salvation which Thou hast provided for us through Jesus Christ Thy Son, help us to appreciate also the house of God in which we meet for Thy worship and to fit ourselves for Thy work in the world. And forbid, we pray Thee, that we should be selfish, providing ourselves with houses of worship, but extending no aid to our less fortunate brethren to enable them to enjoy the same religious privileges. Help us, we beseech Thee, to so worship Thee and serve Thee in these earthly tabernacles that we may be permitted at least to see Thee face to face and worship Thee where there is no longer need of temple or altar or sacrifice. And Thine shall be the praise through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen!

Editor's Easy Chair Or MACATAWA MUSINGS.

Now and then the Divine Artist paints a picture on this earth which suggests and is probably intended to suggest something of the beauty and glory of that fairer world of which we sing and dream. Such a picture a party of us were privileged to see a few evenings since. We were fishing on Black Lake about midway between the Park and Holland. It had been a dark, cloudy day, made the more dismal by a drizzling rain which fell at intervals during all the afternoon. An hour before sunset a strip of blue appeared on the western horizon, arching upward until the sun shone out with all its imprisoned glory, and seemed to focus its beams upon the southern and eastern shores of the little lake. The trees, the grass, the green banks, the houses along the shore shone with an unearthly beauty. At the same time a double rainbow, perfect in all its colors and making a perfect arch spanned the horizon above the illuminated shore, and the scene was one of surpassing grandeur and glory. For the time being we were transfixed by it, and became indifferent as to whether the fish were biting or not. Such a display of gorgeous colors, such tints and tones, one seldom sees. Under the double arch of these rainbows and beyond the shore of the lake lay the little city of Holland in the distance like an earthly gem in a heavenly setting. An Oklahoma senator, who chanced to be a member of the party, as if to moderate the enthusiasm of the rest of us, teld us that such scenes were not uncomon down in his favored portion of the earth. But we must believe that there were elements entering into that picture which could hardly be found even in the beautful territory of Oklahoma. But there is no spot on earth but has its charms and its beauty, if only we have eyes to see and hearts to appreciate.

We recently had a tragedy here at the Park from a parachute performance. An æronaut, who takes chances on his life for money, came here at the invitation of some one who bears some responsibility for the tragical result, and made his ascension in a balloon, performing, meanwhile, on the trapeze. At a height of several hundred feet he dropped, relying on his parachute for a gradual descent. The parachute opened in due time and the rapid descent was stopped so suddenly that the man's hold on it was released, and he fell from the awful height in the edge of the small lake, where the water was shallow, resulting, of course, in crushing his body and causing immediate Many who witnessed the terrible scene, especially women, did not recover from the nervous shock it produced for several days. The incident moves us to say that no man who puts a proper estimate on the value and sacredness of human life will risk it in such foolhardy ventures, when there is nothing more to be gained by it than a few dollars for his own pocket and the entertainment of a crowd. Every now and then some one in order to gain notoriety, goes over the Falls at Niagara in a vessel of his own contrivance. These methods of gaining notoriety are less to be condemned than the method adopted by certain cranks in attempting the life of some one in high position, but they are essentially immoral in their low estimate of life and their utter perversion of its true aim.

A walk through the deep, still woods these August days, such as we enjoyed a few mornings ago, offer a splendid opportunity for meditation and reflection. It is easy to compare the various kinds of trees one sees in such a walk with the different types of human beings one knows in actual life. This tall, smooth, graceful beach that sends up its trunk high in the air before putting forth any branches is the polished, scholarly gentleman, whose life has not been stunted by poverty or his education hampered by assuming matrimonial responsibilities too early. This stalwart, knotty oak, with its huge trunk and wide-spreading branches, affording shelter for the birds and squirrels and offering shade to man and beast-who cannot see that it represents the strong, selfmade man, who has suffered many adversities and borne many responsibilities and has been developed by them into the rugged, honest, generous hearted, manly man that he is? And there is the beautful hard maple-how rich in folage, how symmetrical in form, how grateful its shade, how glorious in its robes of green in spring and summer and of gold and crimson in autumn! How sweet the very sap of its veins! Who does not know that this tree represents womanhood at its best, and especially some particular woman, whom we have all known sometimeand loved? And these beautiful, tender young saplings; of course they stand for the children-the future forest of humanity. But these fallen trees that lie prone upon the earth-trees that were once the monarchs of the forest-now dead and decaying, they have a meaning full of pathos. Once they defied the winter's storms and stood erect in their strength and glory. But time has pulled them down and laid them in the dust. These represent our fallen heroes, our great men, who have served their age and generation faithfully and have fallen in the strife. Forgotten by many of the living, their names and their deeds are known to Him to whom all live. Such are some of the reflections awakened by a stroll through Macatawa woods.

It has become evident to the proprietors of the Park Association that accommodations here must be increased before a larger number of people can be received and cared for. A few have come and gone away without finding a place whereon to lay their heads. This has only been the case for a week or two. Now we hear that one of the hotels is to be enlarged, and several new cottages are to be erected to accommodate those who want to make this place their summer home. Cottage life here is far preferable to hotel or boarding-house life, and cheaper. Those coming here for a few weeks should rent or build a cottage. When not occupied it is an easy matter to rent it. J. J. Haley is spending a few weeks here with his family. B. A. Jenkins runs over occasionally from Buffalo, N. Y., to spend a few days with his family, who are summering here. The service last Lord's day was very enjoyable. A good sermon by Rev. Frank Lee was followed by a union communion service presided over by T. P. Haley and Rev. Burgess. This was greatly enjoyed by the large company of believers who participated.

Edgewood-on-the-Lake, Aug. 18, 1900.

Willing submission to the influences and guidance of the Holy Spirit is the supremest test of sonship in the family of God. Conformity to formal godlines without the spirit is the poorest kind of religion.

Our Budget.

- -The allied troops are in Pekin.
- -The foreign ministers have been relieved.
- -Now for the greatest diplomatic contest the world has yet known.
- -The future of China is now in the hands of the ruling powers of the world.
- —We have had another week of sweltering weather. The country about St. Louis is suffering for rain.
- —On account of Church Extension literature this number many of our regular correspondents' and contributors' articles are crowded out, but their realization of the importance of this branch of our missionary work will not permit them to complain. Church Extension needs the emphasis.
- —Emperor William has taken to preaching. The press recently contained a sermon preached by him on board his imperial yacht from Ex. 16:11 for a text. This is a new role for emperors and beset with embarrassments. But why not? It's better than war speeches. But in such a case who shall criticise the ways of the Emperor; or will he see his own sins and repent; or should a man who rules a nation by "divine right" be criticised?
- —"Bible Study Sunday." Had you heard about it? Well, it's the second Sunday in September. Now turn to J. Z. Tyler's article in this paper and he will tell you all about its origin, purpose and importance. Do not fail to read it, even if this is Church Extension number.
- —Last week the Foreign Society received $1,000 on the annuity plan, making now, in all, about $93,500. It is the desire of the society and all the friends of missions that this fund shall reach the $100,000 mark before the close of the present missionary year.
- —Joe! Brown, field agent for the B. A. C. C., informs us that the Oskaloosa College board of Oskaloosa, Ia., has tendered the college property to the Benevolent Association of the Christian Church in which to establish an Orphans' Home for Iowa. It is thought that this action on the part of the board meets the approval of the Iowa brethren, but to decide the matter definitely the proposition will be submitted to the state convention at Des Moines, Ia., September 4, at the hour given to the B. A. C. C. All interested in the care of orphans and in the disposition of Oskalcosa College property are urged to be present on that occasion.
- —In our next issue we will begin a series of four articles on "The Gladstone and Huxley Controversy," by A. M. Haggard, dean Bible chair of Drake University. Both the subject and the writer make those articles a very promising treat for our readers.
- -The only son of Bro. Z. T. Sweeney, Columbus, Ind., was drowned while bathing in White River, near that place, on the 13th inst. In a letter from Bro. Sweeney's secretary, he says: "He was in company with some boys, but they did not realize his peril until he had gotten beyond their reach, owing to the fact that Joe was accustomed to staying under water some length of time when diving. He has a scar on his head, and apparently met with some obstruction in the water, which caused him to lose consciouness." Brother and Sister Sweeney, and the entire family, have the sincere sympathy of a large circle of friends in all parts of the country in this irreparable loss which they have sustained. Joseph was a stalwart, manly young man with promise of a long and useful life, and his untimely departure is one of those sad mysteries of life, the full explanation of which must be waited for until we no longer "see through a glass darkly.'

- —Special Church Extension issue this week and $250,000 for that fund by September 30th.
- —If you will read what we publish this week concerning our extension work you will be a convert to the plan; that is, if you need converting.
- —The perpetual use of money, as illustrated in our Church Extension Fund, has no comparison anywhere in any financial concern.
- —The use of money and the good it will do must be shown in results. Money in our Extension Fund will build a new church every five years, and in working as a loan it stimulates the church in self-reliance.
- —The display of twenty-six church buildings which have been completed by the aid of Church Extension forms an interesting chapter in our growth. Ours used to be the little church around the corner. Not so now.
- —The cuts illustrate the kind of work our Board of Church Extension is doing in mission fields. A church building should be in every way commensurate with the town and adquate to the demands of the new organization. If it is not the church will not grow. A costlier building is needed in a large and growing city than in a small town. These buildings are fair samples of the more than 550 that are sprikling our land because of the timely aid of our Church Extension Board.
- —The article from the pen of F. D. Power on "The Chain Letter and Other Schemes" is well worth pondering. In their helplessness they resort to such methods to get money. They should all be discouraged because they are failures, and we should build up our Extension Fund because it is a success.
- —A man who had to travel very extensively ard for years through Mohammedan lands, when returning to England said in an article: "Mohammedanism is dying, because they are building no new mosques, neither are they repairing the old ones." It is true that nothing is a better indication of the growth and prosperity of a religious body than the buildings they put up.
- —If their church buildings are tottering and look shabby and no new ones are building in the growing communities it is a sure sign of a loss of the evangelistic spirit of that body, and certain decay is inevitable.
- —If victory comes in September by our Extension Board reaching $250,000, it will come as a result of the preachers doing their duty. The apportionment has been sent to the churches. If each minister will bring the church's duty to its official board, and in prayer and thought these good men shall go to work to help their pastor the result of the September offering will be amazing.
- —It is easy to say that people ought to inform themselves as to all departments of church work. However, the history of the past will likely be a prophecy of the future. It is conceded that men have a right and must be informed about their own business. Any method that best serves is used by those who are planning to win. The blackness of darkness of ignorance concerning plans and projects of the church will not be dispelled except by the preachers and elders. Those who read our papers can be informed, but thousands upon thousands must learn about Church Extension only from the pastor's lips.
- —Our Extension Fund is loaned only to such as cannot build except by borrowing and that cannot borrow elsewhere. There are hundreds such as these. Many people honestly believe, unless otherwise informed, that if a church can give first mortgage security with a clear title, with all debts paid except what the loan pays, and will insure the house well in favor of the lender, any secular institution will loan such a church money

- enough to complete the building. It is not the case, however. If the loan is ever made it is at a fearfully high rate of interest on short time and the interest payable in advance. Recently our church at Garber, Oklahoma, applied for a loan, saying that they could borrow $400 for one year at 24 per cent, by paying the interest in advance. This church gladly took money from our annuity fund, agreeing to pay six per cent. and be in the hands of our board. They knew that to pay 24 per cent. was to invite mortgage foreclosure and loss of their building, while borrowing from our Extension Fund was to keep their property in the hands of the brotherhood. If the church goes down and the Extension Board must sell the property the amount loaned is realized and the money instead of being lost builds another church.
- —Will you attend the Iowa state convention? If so, kindly send your address to W. A. Hitchcock, 1408 24th St., Des Moines, that entertainment may be provided for you.
- The program of the Minoesota state convention, to be held in St. Paul this week, came too late to appear in our columns. The convention opens August 21 and closes August 25. This is the 43rd annual convention and the program is full of living topics and by strong public speakers both men and women. We are sure that the brethren will have a great convention in St. Paul this week.
- —The 10th annual catalog of Southern Christian Institute, Edwards, Miss., is to hand and we are pleased at the showing it makes as an educational institution. This work is aided by our A. C. M. S. on beltalf of the colored people in the South. The catalog shows the adaptation of the institute to the condition and wants of the people, which is after all the education most needed.
- -The receipts of the New York Committee of One Hundred on the India famine relief work now amounts to over $200,000. The rate of daily receipts has been upwards of $2,000 and from all parts of the country and conditions and ages of humanity. There is something inspiring as well as heroic in such demonstrations of the unity of the human family and sympathy in time of distress. Let this good work go on. Another $100,000 is wanted within the next thirty days.
- —The catalog of Kansas Christian College, Harper, Kas., for 1899 1900, shows a well-organized, well-equipped and well-attended college. That Aaron Prince Aten is bringing this school to the front is evident in the increased attendance and popularity of the college during the last school year. Christian College is well located and there is no reason why it should not erjoy a large measure of success. It supplies the need of a vast and rich agricultural district for a college and is worthy of the most liberal patronage.
- -The discovery of the library of the great temple at Nippur, by Prof. Hilprect, president of the University of Pennsylvania, with over 17,000 tablets not one of which is supposed to be later than 2280 B. C., will probably take rank as one of the greatest discoveries of the century. It is said that it will require five years to excavate the unexplored rooms of the temple library, and these may prove as rich in tablets as those already uncovered. It seems that we are about to recover the knowledge of many centuries of a civilization heretofore known only as a prehistoric civilization. The translation of these tablets will require many years, but their contents will be most anxiously awaited by the world. It is not probable, however, that any knowledge will be revealed that will materially affect present civilizations or their religions. Christianity will stand the test of the past, the present and the future, because it is rom God and for man's elevation.

—The program of the 63rd annual convention of the Missouri Christian Co-operation, to be held in Moberly, S:pt. 17-20, came to hand on press day and cannot appear until next issue. Look out for it next week and prepare for a rousing convention—the best in the history of the state.

—Some enterprising merchants with a good capital, who are members of the Christian Church, are wanted to locate in Mankato, Kan. Two of the best merchants of that city are retiring from business and our people want business men of the Christian Church to take their places. Mankato is one of the best locations in the state the county seat of Jewell. For further information, address K., in care of this paper.

—The annual catalog of Hazel Green Academy with announcements for 1900-1901 is out with its good record for the past and its promising outlook for the future school year. This educational institution is supported by the C. W. B. M. and is doing a splendid missionary work in Eastern Kentucky. Wm. H. Cord is the principal of the academy.

—Any person who would like to assist a worthy young man in preparing himself for the ministry may find an opportunity by addressing a letter to S. A. Moore, Gentryville, Ind.

—On Tuesday night, August 28th, the Mt. Cabanne Church, of this city, will give a farewell meeting to their pastor, Dr. Dungan, and his family who leave for Canton, Mo., before the close of the month. In this farewell all of the activities of the church will participate and the occasion will be both memorable and impressive. All of the pastors of the city and as many of their respective congregations as can attend are invited. The entire city will join with Mt. Cabanne in regrets for the loss of Bro. Dungan and his family from this field. Dr. Dungan, however, will continue to supply the pulpit of the Mt. Cabanne Church from Canton until a successor has been secured.

-The financial statement of the Second Christian Church, rendered August 11th, shows that the sum of $1,579.73 has been raised by the various activities of the church and its friends and pastor toward the liquidation of the church debt and interest. Of this amount $1,150 was paid on the debt, reducing it to $3,800. The interest, $456. was paid by the pastor, W. D. Pittman, who in addition to this giving has supplied the pulpit and also kept an assistant pastor in the field Dur ing the year there have been 98 additions to the church, 51 of which were by baptism. In addition to the above moneys raised the church has paid for Sunday-school literature and other indebtedness the sum of $360 78, which did not go through the church treasurer's hands. This is certainly a marvelous work, one that cannot probably be duplicated in the history of the church in Missouri or in the United States.

—If the following paragraph from an article in the Evangelist, by Prof. John DeWitt, on creed revision, may be taken as an expression of the condition of Presbyterian preachers theirs is certainly one of perplexity and extremely unenviable. A creed revised by a ministry of doubt would be neither satisfactory nor durable:

The most that the Presbyterian Church can do in respect to modern thought it must do through its individual ministers. These ministers ought to exercise charity in judging each other, to be slow in condemning one another, to remember that all of us are living in an age of inquiry and doubt, and that every one, or almost every one, is engaged in answering objections or surmounting difficulties proposed by himself to himself. There is one other thing we can do, and that is to remind ourselves that such an age as ours is must be an exceedingly poor age for the work of amending a creed or for that of making a new creed.

Personal Mention.

E. H. Kellar, pastor of the church at Carrollton, Mo., is in a meeting at Roads, Mo.

T. Augustus Reid, general secretary of colored work, has removed from Frankfort, Ky., to Maysville same state.

David Husband, of Olivia, Minn, has accepted a call to preach for the church in Waitsburg, Wash., to begin Sept. 2nd.

"The Devil Quoting Scripture" will be the subject of W. A. Moore's discourse at Beulah Christian Church, this city, Sunday evening August 26th.

O. D. Maple, paster of the Church of Christ in Scottville, Ill., has resigned to take effect 60 days from October 20th. This congregation will then want another preacher.

After a tour of three months through Northeast Virginia and West Virginia, C. M. Hughes, singing evangelist, has returned to his home in L*xington, Ky., and is ready to engage for work wherever needed. The West or Northwest preferred.

O. F. Jordan, of Fisher, Ill., was united in marriage with Ida Kinsey, of Portland, Ind, en Aug. 6. Mrs. Jordan was formerly C. W. B. M. missianary to Bina, India. They have been called to serve the church in Fisher another year, and will begin an active campaign by holding a meeting soon.

Allan B. Philputt, pastor of the Central Church, Indianapolis, is spending a few weeks with his brothe , J. M. Philputt, pastor of the Lennox Ave. Church, New York City, at Bensonhurst, Long Island. He will supply two Sundays for the First Church, Philadelphia.

E. T. McFarland, pastor of the Fourth Christian Church, this city, has returned from his vacation trip, but not his family. The Fourth Church has opened up its campaign by sending in $46 to the treasurer of our city mission board for our city mission work. This is a promising indication of a live church.

W. H. Willyard, now of Beaver Falls, Pa., is the author of a little book called 'The Divine Creed' that is meeting with considerable favor by the people. Those who have read the book express themselves as greatly pleased with it and profited by it.

Howard T. Cree, pastor of the Christian Church at Maysville, Ky., passed through St Louis accompanied by his wife, en route to Colorado where they expect to sp-nd a few weeks visiting, sightseeing and recreating. Bro. Cree reports having closed a two weeks' meeting at Mt. Carmel, on Saturday, August 11th, with 15 additions.

Rev. A. R. Adams will occupy the Cristian Tabernacle pulpit, Decatur, Ill., the first Sunday in September. It is understood he has received an invitation to visit that church with a view of becoming their pastor. Lynnville will regret very much to see him leave.—Lynnville Correspondent to Jacksonville Courier.

The sermon preached by R E. Rosenstein, pastor of the Church of Christin Manhatton, Kansas, July 22, before a union meeting of Methodists, Baptists, Presbyterians, Congregationalists and Christians, has been published in tract form and can be had for three cents per copy or thirty cents per dozen.

F.F. Walters, of Anita, Iowa, reports considerable advancement in the church there, but at great sacrifice on the part of the brethren. They have paid an indebtedness on their house and have had 26 additions to the church. The Christian Church, he says, is the most popular one of the five churches in Anita.

E. M. Johnson closed his work at Minden, Neb., Aug. 19th, and moves to Bethany to attend Cotner University. Bro. Johnson began at Minden Feb. 1st, 1899; has paid off the Church Extension loan of $425, improved the house to the extent of $100 and raised the church membership to 102. A suitable man is wanted to follow Bro. Johnson at Minden immediately.

Malcolm C. Watson, a young man of Riggs, Mo., who expects to attend Drake University, Des Moines, Iowa, this fall and winter, would like to correspond with any church within one hundred miles of Des Moines wanting preaching for part or for all time. Bro. Watson has had considerable experience in the ministry, having had over 75 additions since Jan. 1st, and can give good references.

C. C. Hill, of California, Mo., closed his first year's work with that congregation August 19th. During the year there has been a net increase in the membership of 24. Amount of money raised for all purposes, $1,450. All departments of the work are in good condition. Notwithstanding the excessively hot weather, there were 176 present at the Bible school August 19th, and good audiences at both services, with one addition in the morning.

Public and Private Rights Criticised.

The B. B. Tyler letter in this paper criticises Public and Private Rights. That is all right. We covet criticism. But we do not feel satisfied with Dr. Tyler's criticism. We object to being accredited with positions assumed by the critic. The book nowhere states that "all moneys needed to carry on the government shall be collected by taxes levied on land." It positively states the contrary. The book does not advocate any tax theory but a better way; a proper division of public and private properties and rights and a proper business control of all public properties and rights by governments in the interest of the public. That a revenue could be raised from these public possessions in a businesslike and legitimate way for government purposes that would be far more equitable and just than our present or any other tax system. Evidently Dr. Tyler has permitted preconceived ideas to blind him to the real thesis of the book he criticises. I am glad that Dr. Tyler has written about the book. It shows how badly such a book is needed, even among our preachers.

We do not believe in burdening the weak and exempting the strong. We do not believe in any system of govern ent that permits men to grow rich by use or control of that which belongs to the public. No kind of robbery is more unjust. What we insist upon is that the government protect and administer public possessions for the public and not barter or give them away as political spoils or permit them to be taken by greedy wealth-seekers without due compensation to the public. If the public were duly compensated for all its rightful possessions it would need to resort to no tax system for governmental expenses. The Single Tax doctrine is only incidentally referred to in my book and not advocated as a cure-all for our national evils. There are other great principles advocated. We hope the Doctor will read his THE AUTHOR. copy again.

To Relieve Lassitude Take Horsford's Acid Phosphate.

A few drops added to balf a glass of water relieves the feeling or lassitude so common in midsummer. A pleasant and wholesome tonic.

That "Reign of Law" Again.

By an unfortunate omission of a comma I am made to say in the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST of Aug. 9 the opposite from what I wrote. In my notice of Bro. Tyler's commendation of Lane Allen's "Reign of Law" I am made to say of W. B. Smith that he was "well known in Missouri while a professor in Missouri University as having been a student of the College o' the Bible, becoming an infidel while a student, and being expelled for his infidelity." In reality I said that Mr. Allen represented the hero of his novel as having had such an experience in the College of the Bible, and I denied the truth of his representation.

The typographer also makes me say that "neither Mr. Allen, nor W. B. Smith, nor any other person corresponding to his David was ever a student of the Bible." I wrote or aimed to write "was never a student of the College of the Bible."

I see that the book reviewer of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST has received and expressed the idea respecting our college, which the novel is calculated and was doubtless intended to convey, for he says in his notice of the novel that "it contains much about the Bible School at Lexington. It traces the history of a boy who goes up from the hempfields to study for the ministry; how he becomes dissatisfied with the prevailing ideas of the school and is carried out into doubt, and finally goes back to the farm; thence to a northern college." The reviewer also says: "In a way it condemns the narrowness and bigotry of the times and shows how much such a spirit will hamper a young man."

I suppose it is scarcely worth while for me to deny that the College of the Bible is characterized by "narrowness and bigotry," for certain persons who know nothing about it have sworn that it is and they will never repent; but the representation that by its teaching any one of its students has ever been so "hampered" as to become an infidel is a vile slander. What the reviewer styles "the history of a boy who goes up from the hempfields to study for the ministry becomes dissatisfied with prevailing ideas of the school and is carried out into doubt" is no history at all; it is pure invention on the part of Mr. Allen.

Chautauqua Season

approaches its close. Next Wednesday is the recognition day of all the C. L. S. C. classes, and on the 23rd the final wind-up. No man has appeared on the platform with more determined earnestness, pleading for the time of individual character and life-and for the strength and patriotic country saving power of the middle classes than Russell H. Conwell. His mighty appeal before the Grangers yesterday and powerful sermon Sunday was worth a whole season of study to the great workers and solid strength of this country. President Milligan, of Kentucky University, has spent some time here. He will preside at the ministers' meeting to-morrow. Subject: "How Best to Conduct Weekly Prayermeetings." President Zollars and wife had a good rest here, and all Hiram College will want to stir the waters of Chautauqua Lake, next year. Dr. Gerould, of Cleveland, Albert Teachout and sons, are here. A. Teachout will come next week. Bro. Abberly and family, of Columbus; Bro. Walker, of Kentucky; W. A. Hanna and wife, of Washington, are here. Bro. Van Horn, of Warren O., will lead communion service Sunday and Dr. Bainbridge, of New York, will speak of mission

Miss Emma Lyon, our missionary from China, was before the hall conference of general missions, and also Miss Graybiel, of Mahoba, India, the past week. W. J. F.

Tri-City Notes.

Davenport, Rock Island and Moline constitute an interesting trinity geographically, commercially and religiously.

Davenport is separated from the others, politically, by the Iowa-Illinois state line and naturally by the Mississippi River, but Uncle Sam has bridged them both and has ample means of pre serving the peace on his 1,300-acre island in their midst.

The street railway system and other important concerns bear the name of "Tri-City." The government has expended something like $20,000,000 in the arsenal buildings and otherwise, on the island, and in the improvement of the river channel for navigation. It has 1,300 employees—had 4,500 during the late war-and a monthly pay roll, at present, of about $120,000. This, together with the immense sawmills and numerous other manufacturing plants which would be creditable to St. Louis, or any other place, make this a commercial center of no mean importance.

Religiously, the Catholics and Lutherans predominate. The Presbyterians, Methodists and Congregationalists are quite strong and we are comparatively a "feeble folk." Comparatively, remember, for, although 635 people among 80,000 is a small showing, yet, if our present strength and equipment are properly utilized as the nucleus of what we ought to become, the future will make a different record.

The Davenport Church is one of the oldest in Iowa. The writer had the pleasure of being present at its 61st anniversary, July 29th. This is more then twice the age of the present genial and successful pastor, C. C. Davis, and antedates the birth of his father by four years. As others, who are better qualified, are writing the interesting history of the church for publication, will only add that with the present membership of 235 the admirably located $12,000 church property, free of encumbrance and a good list of subscribers for the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST, our interests in Davenport ought to be safe.

Rock Island and Moline together about equal Davenport in population, and they are together, for the only thing that distinguishes between them is a change in the series of house numbers.

In 1868, Bro. Philemon D. Mitchell, a consecrated and successful business man, gathered the nucleus of a church, meeting from the first in one of his buildings. His wealth and liberality and the membership of the church grew together and, like David, "he was minded to build a house to the Lord," but though not for the same reason, the Lord did not permit him to do it. After his death his children built and presented to the congregation the present "Memorial Church," worth $20,-000. It is a model of convenience and good taste and in an ideal location for a central church for all time. In addition to this the church has a good mission chapel about midway between the memorial church and Moline, where a flourishing Sunday-school has long been maintained. This should be a valuable feeder to the church.

There is a large field in Moline, where reside half a dozen families of the Rock Island Church, including W. F. Eastman, the senior elder.

There are said to be 10,000 Swedes in Rock Island and Moline, not more than one fourth of whom are church members. Why should this not be a fruitful field?

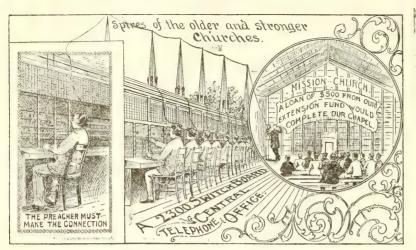

T. W. Grafton's ministry covers the most of our growth in Rock Island and he resigned under the strongest protest. W. H. Johnson will assume the pastorate Sept. 1st. The present membership is about 400. Proceeding down the "Father of Waters" on the steamer Quincy, these impressions brought the pencil into requisition and com-pel the conviction that whether it be under local, state or national auspices the evangelization of the tri-cities ought to be undertaken on a more comprehensive scale then heretofore.

Help Them Now.

It is said that missionaries in the famine district in India can scarcely eat their daily bread because of hearing the cry of the starving ringing in their ears. What an earnest appeal for an offering for this fund the preachers would make if they could but hear the cry which comes from all parts of this land for help! I have sent my petition and know something of the earnest effort which so many bands of believers heroically put forth. Nothing is more noble, Christlike, than to see the strong help the weak. The Master taught this lesson so beautifully in his peerless life, and the Apostle Paul gave emphasis to this truth. There is something inspiring in seeing a small number of Disciples meeting in an obscure, outof-the-way place to remember the Lord who said: "This do in remembrance of Me." Whyso? Because it is a test of their faith Why is this their faith be honored by us? This will depend largely on the faithfulness of the preachers. An offering to this fund is the seal of love of a great brotherhood. F. J. LONGDON, JR. De Land, Fla.

The Key to the Situation

There is no use evading the fact that the preacher and elders are the important factors in securing an offering for any missionary enterprise. They hold the key to open or keep closed the door when Church Extension comes knocking and pleading to be heard.

The cut above amply illustrates the situation. In the circle to the right is the mission church, worshiping in an uncompleted building. The preacher is on the platform sending the message. He says: "A loan of $500 from our Extension Board would complete our chapel." The message is to our older and stronger congregations. The preachers are at the switchboard in the central office, and they must make the connection or the message from the pastor of the mission church will never reach the ears of the older congregations.

In the last twelve years about 2,300 appeals have come to the Board of Church Extension for aid. There are yet others that have not had the courage to appeal. Many of these congregations have died for lack of church homes. New congregations are being organized at the rate of one each day in the year. New towns are springing up on the lines of new railroads that are constantly being projected. Unless one follows the growth of our country and the growth of our people in numbers the facts come like a flash of lightning.

Will not our people arouse themselves and rise up to meet the demand made upon the Church Extension Fund? Let us see to it that the call of the board is heeded. Let all our missionary congregations, four thousand strong, prepare now for the Church Extension offering in September and roll in the $20,000 needed to complete the $250,000. The preachers helped to reach the mark set by the Home, Foreign and C. W. B. M. Societies, and they can be counted on to help the Board of Church Extension reach their goal.

The only absolute sure method is for the churches to raise the apportionment suggested by the board. The amount asked is not unreasonable. It is an easy matter to raise it or to let it slip by. To neglect the offering is to fail, for your share of the effort can not be done without. Remember, the missions that ask aid of you can borrow money nowhere else. Brother Preacher, let your church hear their cry. They ask you to help them to help themselves by way of the Church Extension loan. Let your fellowship and theirs be one—that of the helper and the helped. Let us rally for the $250,000.

Failure Means Humiliation.

No man has risen to offer an objection or a criticism of the wisdom of building churches for the worship of God and the furtherance of the interests of his kingdom among men. And yet, our Church Extension Fund is not as large by many thousands as it should be. The mark set for September 30th is $250,000. In view of our wealth, in view of the demand for houses of worship, in view of the larger funds of religious peoples no abler than we, failure to reach this should cause every true Disciple to hang his head in humiliation. Our weakness in the cities at a time when the rush is thitherward, remembering our strength in the country and small towns, is almost wholly due to our inability from lack of money to build suitable houses of worship at the opportune time. Many times in the larger cities have I hunted for one of our churches as a woman searcheth for a penny she hath lost, and found some insignificant building overshadowed by the stable of some rich man.

When the lamented David Wetzel preached in Portland, Ore., one day he was sitting on the heights west of the city, pointing out the different public buildings and churches to a visiting brother preacher. At last pointing towards our miserable little tabernacle, standing in the neighborhood of churches costing from seventy-five to a hundred thousand dollars, he exclaimed in his characteristic way: "There's the tabernacle; she looms up like a huckleberry in a bowl of milk!" The application is apparent. If we had built a $20,000 house in Portland twenty years ago to-day we would have five or six strong churches instead of still being in the problematic stage.

There are four spots upon which I beg leave to place a good, strong plaster. Spot No. 1: The wealthy Disciple who has not given liberally to the fund. How shall they, into whose hands money has been given discharge the trust by hoarding it or by spending it for the gratification of hurtful and useless desires? Spot No. 2: The church officers who are not in touch with anything beyond the local congregation. Those who discourage the preacher when he talks of the offering for Church Extension. Those who adjourn the officers' meetings without taking any action on the matter of missions. Spot No. 3: The elders of the churches not having regular preaching. They are responsible for the work. They sh uld take special pains with the offering, seeing there is no preacher to look after it. Are they willing to admit they are not competent to do this as the preacher? Spot No. 4: The preacher who habitually neglects to look after the offering with any reasonable degree of energy and faith. Why should we be faint-hearted? That invites defeat. Why should we not expect great things? That means larger success in every instance. H. A. DENTON.

Church Extension.

I am fully persuaded that the present system of gathering funds for the benefit of struggling congregations in many places to build themselves a home is the best thing our missionary organizations have inaugurated, have brought forth. I don't make this statement for the reason of having read of its success and advantage in various parts of the United States only, but for the fact of having seen many congregations in comfortable homes who owe their condition to the easy terms of getting means to assist them from the Church Extension Fund.

Many of the struggling congregations in Mississippi who are now in splendid church buildings owe their success largely to the building fund. Jackson has one of the prettiest churches in this state and soon she will pay the last dollar on it. Jackson borrowed from the Church Extension Fund. So with West Point and other places. We have points in this state with very good congregations that would prosper more if they but had a home in which to worship. Water Valley, Vicksburg, Greenwood, Tiliatoba and other places have congregations but no church home.

The South is being worked by our missionaries vigorously now, and as the new congregations are born into existence they ought at once to have a church home.

Hundreds of dollars ought to be given now where tens were given last year. The $250,000 ought to be reached during this missionary year for Church Extension.

NATHANIEL G. JACKS, State Evangelist.

Expansion-Why? and How?

Expansion is one of the watchwords of the law. It is the subject of statemen's schemes and a plank in party platforms. Our chief concern, however, is not with national or political, but with church expansion.

It is a word which in itself is the essence of all missionary enterprise, and it expresses one of the greatest blessings which in his compensating providence God makes the result of an interest in missions.

I would give it to the brotherhood as a motto of the epochal year—Expansion. I prefer it to extension. Extension means increase, but it may be separation. Expansion is extension with unity.

It is evident that expansion was God's intention in all his works. Every seed as he made it was to unfold in another. The atmosphere in which we move was so constituted as always to expand itself—to fill and never allow a vacuum. When God made man this was his first, just law: "Be fruitful and multiply and replenish the earth."

And this is the first characteristic of the Christian dispensation, that the door was flung open to all men. The "five hundred" of Galilee grew on and on to the "three thousand" of Jerusalem, and the three thousand to the "five thousand," and the five thousand to the "very great company," and the very great company to a "countless multitude." It is all expansion: expansion everywhere. It is the great secret of all government in nature, providence, grace: expansion, and will be till Bethlehem's cradle is the throne of all the earth and Calvary's drops are the ocean of all universal love and peace.

It is the law of the church's life. Every loyal member of the church must long for its increase; and that not in a mere languid, sentimental way, but practically, energetically, personally, as a thing in which he is bound to take his proper part. What a solemn thought for us to-day, if we go on to be untrue to ourselves and to God. He will take away our candlestick; is our lampstand out of its place? Light is diffusive. It must either shine or go out. Every church building erected by the help of our Church Extension Society is a ighthouse in a needed place. The inscription on the Eddystone lighthouse is most appropriate: "To give light and to save life." It might be fitly painted or carved on the front of every one of our prayer and preaching houses—"To give light and to save life."

Yes, that describes the work of this society. Right well is it doing the work. Its methods are businesslike, practical, effective. The results in proportion to its resources are surprisingly satisfactory. We must house our converts or lose them. Men and brethren, help! Heart with heart, hand in hand, shoulder to shoulder, now, all together: let us raise the quarter of a million for Church Extension.

W. F. WATKINS.

Church Extension.

In all the realm of Christian enterprise there is no movement, it seems, that appeals to the thinking men and women of the church as being at once more businesslike, sensible and safe than that of Church Extension as represented by that indomitable, wide-awake, good-natured Christian enthusiast-Geo. Muckley. It ought to appeal to every Disciple of Christ with telling effect. The most conservative as well as the most aggressive should recognize its worth to the brotherhood; the penurious and liberal alike should see in its plans its marvelous working and saving power. The aged Disciple as well as the convert of yesterday, if thoroughly alive to the needs of the hour, will be glad indeed to stand in helpful relationship to it. The past record of Church Extension is its unanswerable argument in behalf of its right to live in our midst. I personally know of two homeless congregations, encouraged by its timely aid, that have since contributed a minister each to our preaching force. Who knows but that the homelike surroundings of these two congregations and the evinced permanency of the work had much to do with these young men in choosing a religious home. Are you a Foreign Mission enthusiast? It is to your interest, then, to encourage Church Extension that the home force may be provided with a comfortable office in which to plan for greater things. Are you a Home Mission specialist? Then remember that the shortest road to the goal of your ambition is by way of the Church Extension powerhouse. Is your mental horizon filled with thoughts of city evangelization or educational advantages? Here there is no more practical way of encouraging these enterprises than by helping to furnish homes for worthy congregations that shall become centers of power in winning those who shall eventually enter the evangelistic field or be blessed of God in the accumulation of means by which our educational interests can be so much encouraged. Viewed from any standpoint Church Extension appeals to the Christian mind as a movement that should be pushed to the front.

Essential to Rapid Growth.

No missionary enterprise is of greater importance than Church Extension. No missionary fund so nearly sustains itself and repeats its usefulness as does the Church Extension Fund. The fund and the plan of Church Extension are absolutely essential to the rapid development of, weak congregations, and thus indirectly to the increase of offerings to all missionary and philanthropic enterprises. The homeless churches appealing to the board for just a little aid just now to enable them to complete their buildings makes it imperative upon the churches to increase the fund this year to $250,000.

Indianapolis, Ind.

An Imperative Obligation.

A call for twenty thousand dollars in the September offering to meet the urgent demands of homeless congregations is now before us. Shall we meet these calls from our brethren in distress like the true, brave and Christian men and women that we ought to be, and that I believe we are, or shall we let them call call in vain when we are amply able to help them? This is the imperative and burning question before us now; and eternal consequences depend upon our answer to this call. The failure or success of this grand movement depends very largely upon our preachers and elders. Let us put self aside for the next few weeks and make this matter one of the most serious and prayerful considerations. Sincere prayer liberalizes our hearts and the exercise of true sympathy ennobles and purifies our affections.

To meet an obligation is the true measurement of manhood. Let us stand up and be measured. The manly discharge of an obligation thrills the heart with the greatest happiness of this life, while a failure to redeem our obligations is regarded the world over as dishonest and unmanly. Church Extension is the perfection or consummation of all our missionary efforts, and without which all our missionary work will be a comparative failure. No church organization can possibly attain to the grand end of its organization without a permanent house of worship. No church can ever be regarded an established fact in any community until they own a church home. It is rarely ever that such a home can be built without contracting a debt which endangers all future happiness, safety and success. This has been confirmed by my experience and observation all through my ministry.

Church Extension never loses a dollar that is put into its hands. Church Extension does not allow the buildings to be sacrificed by money loaners. A living example we have in Bakersfield at this hour. Church Extension came to our aid and saved a house of worship without which we would have no church here to day.

We must reach the $250,000 by Sept. 30th.

Coffee and Heart Disease

SLOWLY AND SURELY AFFECTS THE HEART'S ACTION.

"My heart seemed to be jumping out of my body one morning after I had used some coffee, clear, without cream or sugar—for I had been told that coffee would not hurt me if used that way. We were all greatly frightened at the serious condition of my heart until I remembered that it might be from the coffee.

"So when the trouble passed off, I concluded never to use coffee again. It had hurt me greatly, used in the ordinary way with cream and sugar but I had hoped it would be less harmful without cream and sugar, but the result was no better.

"Since that time we have been using Postum Cereal Food Coffee and my heart has never troubled me at all. We are all delighted with the Postum because we know how to make it and know how valuable it is as a health beverage.

"In speaking to a friend lately about Postum Cereal, she said she did not like it. I found the reason was that it had not been made properly, After I told her to take four heaping teaspoons of Postum to a pint of water and let it boil full fifteen minutes after the real boiling started, she was greatly delighted with it and has been using it since and has been very much better in health. Yours truly,"

What the Beneficiaries Say.

The illustrations of church buildings given elsewhere in this paper with the accompanying testimonials form an unanswerable argument for Church Extension. The kind of buildings put up are adequate to the demands of the situation. The Board expects to help 75 churches this year. All eyes should be turned toward Church Extension in September. It deserves the attention of a united church once a year.

Ira B. Taylor, treasurer Central Christian Church, Weatherford, Texas, says:

About five years ago a congregation of 65 members here were without a house, and to build without assistance was impossible. We appealed to the Extension Board for relief and obtained relief, which enabled us to build a comfortable house of worship, centrally located, in which there has gone up many prayers and praises for the valuable aid the great Church Extension Fund has been and will be to our brotherhood.

J. M. Eplen, Cameron, Tex., says:

I write this to let you know how the Church Extension Board helped us here in Cameron. We were very weak numerically and financially, and without the aid of our board our church would have been in a very critical condition. In fact, our only help was to get help from our Board of Church Extension. We are very weak yet, but we will send a contribution at the appointed time to help swell the Extension Fund for it is the only hope of planting churches in weak places.

Reed Randall, Newton, Kan., says:

The church at Newton had been meeting in hall and store rooms, bravely struggling against their poverty, but with no hope for the immediate establishment of the cause of Christ in the popular county seat of Harvey. We were straining every nerve to build a good house of worship, and it seemed the effort would fail, when like a message direct from God came the decision of the Board of Church Extension, and by their aid we have a fine house, influence and standing in this place, formerly indifferent to us and our plea.

Christie Williams, Bellefontaine, O., says:

The congregation of Disciples here began in 1895 the erection of a new church building, which was dedicated two years ago, having cost nearly $12,000. Having but little wealth we have had a hard struggle to raise the necessary funds. About a year ago the Church Extension Society came to our relief with a loan of $1,800, to be repaid in five annual payments with four per cent. interest. This has been a very great help to us; without it we could hardly have pulled through. We therefore recommend said society as well worthy the support of all lovers of the Master's cause.

A. Lyle Da Jarnette, Colony, Kan., says:

I feel that the Church of Christ at Colony, Kan, could scarcely if indeed not possibly have gotten along without aid from the Church Extension Fund. If we are to build houses for poor church-es, I believe this fund to be indispensable. We expect to raise our apportionment. God bless the C. E. Board.

J. M. Monroe, El Reno, Okla., says:

Since the opening of this territory in 1889 El Reno has been the third town in size and importance in Oklahoma. By securing a loan from the Church Extension Fund six years ago the church was enabled to give permanency to the cause in this important center. This church has been instrumental in organizing churches at four stra tegic points during the past year. Two of these have built commodious chapels. We are now raising the money to pay off the loan. The money will be back in the treasury in three months. The Church Extension Fund means more to Oklahoma than to any other place on earth. Railroads are being built in all directions, new towns are springing up everywhere. Now is the time and the Extension Fund will enable us to take Oklahoma for primitive Christianity.

W. B. Crewdson, Corning, Ia., says:

I assure you we appreciate Church Extension here. It was the means of saving this church when swallowed up in debt. In my judgment we have no more important work. Long may it live and increase in usefulness! You will hear from us about September or a little later in the payment of our interest and one or more of our notes, and we will do you all the good we can.

W. B. Frank, Chandler, O. K., says:

We will take the September collection for the Extension Fund. If there is a church anywhere that realizes the value of this fund, the church at Chandler should be one, for had it not been for the help we got from that source we could not have the commodious house we have. We would not have undertaken the task with no prospect of help from the board. This fund should be made very strong, so our brotherhood can be among the first to plant the cause of Christ wh re it has not been planted, and thereby be enabled to have a house to meet in.

G. Wilton Lewis, Everett, Mass., says:

It has been the anchor of the church at Everett, Mass., and is investment by the Board was so well placed that it is secured by a property worth $1.46 for every dollar that was invested in cash. It has been the means of planting in Everett, a city of 20,000 people, the nucleus of that progress in Bible teaching which is bending toward the desirable restoration of gospel simplicity and destined to bring into closer touch the followers of the Lord Jesus throughout the land. The experiment of missions is not always successful, but with a loan judiciously placed it has in this case secured the cause in one of the cities of New England. Everett is a suburb of Boston.

N. W. Fletcher, Ballard, Wash., says:

I desire to thank the Church Extension Board for the assistance it rendered us in building our house of worship in Ballard. We would likely not have undertaken the work of our present house of worship if it had not been for the encouragement we received from the Church Extension Board. It gave us a loan of $400 on the easiest terms offered by any church extension board with which I am acquainted. Now we have a property worth about $2,000. It is a wise purpose of the Board not to make gifts, but to assist those who need help and are then willing to help themselves and others by paying the loan so others can have like opportunity and the additional help of making annual offerings for the broadening of the work the church has under its management. The annual offering will be placed before the congregation for September 2, 1900.

J. M. Pollard, Lewis Station, Mo., says:

The loan we received from the Church Extension Fund, of Kansas City, Mo., has been a great favor to the church at this place, as if we had not received help we do not see how we could have kept our building from going to sale for the balance that was due on the building, and through the leniency of the board we will be able by the first of September to liquidate the debt, which will leave us a church of our own clear of debt, for which we feel under lasting obligations to the Board of Extension. As an evidence of the appreciation of the favor we received we will make an appropriation of $4 to the Extension Fund.

R. L. Maury, New Decatur, Ala., says:

After several years' buffeting from place to place the congregation, consisting of about 40 members, worshiping at this place, decided to make one grand move toward building a church. Our efforts were rewarded. In the fall of 1897 Our enorts were rewarded. In the fail of 1897 we erected a house and held services in same in September, 1897, yet it was not completed; besides, we had incurred a debt of $400. This, considering how poor the most of our members were, gave us a great deal of concern, but in January, 1898, we made application to the Board of Church Extension for a loan of $400, which was granted at a very low rate of interest. This enabled us to liquidate all floating debts, complete and seat our church in a neat, comfortable manner. As a church beneficiary we cannot speak too highly of the Board of Church Extension of the American Christian Missionary Society.

J. P. Lucas, Colorado City, Col., says:

Had it not been for the timely assistance redered by the loan from the Board of Church Entension, the little congregation of Diciples (Colorado City would have been without a churchouse. But now we rejoice in having a neat are commodious little chapel, situated in one of the lost parks of the city, wherein we can work commodious little chapel, situated in one of the best parts of the city, wherein we can worsh God, and around which sacred memories will foever gather as the years of greater prosperit and growth shall come and go. We shall so to as possible reciprocate the helpfulness bestowe by the Extension Board, and pray God's choice blessings may rest upon the work of Church Extension and pray God's choice blessings may rest upon the work of Church Extension Board, and pray God's choice blessings may rest upon the work of Church Extension Board, and pray God's choice blessings may rest upon the work of Church Extension Board, and pray God's choice blessings may rest upon the work of Church Extension Board, and pray God's choice blessings may rest upon the work of Church Extension Board, and pray God's choice blessings may rest upon the work of Church Extension Board, and pray God's choice blessings may rest upon the work of Church Extension Board, and pray God's choice blessings may rest upon the work of Church Extension Board, and pray God's choice blessings may rest upon the work of Church Extension Board, and pray God's choice blessings may rest upon the work of Church Extension Board, and pray God's choice blessings may rest upon the work of Church Extension Board, and pray God's choice blessings may rest upon the work of Church Extension Board, and pray God's choice blessings may rest upon the work of Church Extension Board, and pray God's choice blessings may rest upon the work of Church Extension Board, and pray God's choice blessings may rest upon the work of Church Extension Board, and pray God's choice blessings may rest upon the work of Church Extension Board, and pray God's choice blessings may rest upon the work of Church Extension Board, and pray God's choice blessings may rest upon the work of Church Extension Board, and pray God's choice blessings may rest upon the work of Church Extension Board, and pray God's choice blessings may rest upon the work of Church Extension Board, and pray God's choice blessin tension and increase its power for good.

Leon Chavanne, Lake Charles, La., says:

I desire to add a few words of praise for the noble work the Board of Charch Extension here and is now doing. If it had not been for this board we may not have had a place of worship at this place. We have a beautiful building upon which the board made us a loan of $750 for five years, to wipe out balance of indebtedness. We hope the brotherhood throughout the Unio will send an offering to Board of Church Extension September to aid you in this great work. To in September to aid you in this great work. can depend upon us doing our part.

Sunday-School Literature.

THE matter of Sunday-school Literature is one of very great importance. whether it should be so or not, the fact is that the character of the instruction given in nine-tenths of the Sunday-school classes throughout the country is determined by the contents of the Lesson Helps they use. being true, and the fact that first impressions are most lasting, how important that Pastors and Superintendents of Christian Sunday-schools see that their Schools are supplied with Christian Periodicals. If the children are taught that one church is as good as another, that certain divine commands are of little or no importance, or can be changed or set aside by man, what effect will it have on the church of the future? What Some State Secretaries Say.

It is well known that organizing new inday-schools and churches is simply pitched the tents of the scouting party. Our ate Secretaries and evangelists know this may believe implicitly in Church Extension, hen their new churches cannot build expt by outside aid they call upon the nurch Extension Board, as does also the merican Society. There is the most intiate relation between the various evangelitic boards and the Church Extension pard.

No government is much account abroad aless it is well established at home. An my cannot be maintained in a foreign untry unless there are large storebuild-gs for supplies and barracks for recruits home. To increase our work abroad we ust strengthen it at home and give our eak churches buildings in which they can alist and drill recruits. Church Extension es this by enabling them to obtain money om sympathetic parties at low rate of a terest.

Church Extension saves a church from the money shark, and by its yearly payment an prevents it from forming the bad abit of neglecting to raise the money till the debt falls due.

Church Extension is the united effort of Il the churches to establish the weaker nes without making them beggars or sinkng them in debt.

Our board should have much more than 250,000 for this work. More: our churches are able to give. More still: I believe that if a way could be found to force this abject upon the attention of the churches ney would give it. Our people are not liberal. They simply do not know their prortunities. The world is wide and we re too narrow for it.

Church Extension.

Our stirring, zealous and never-tiring ecretary of Church Extension says that we an reach the $250,000 mark by the 30th f September if our churches will only raise heir respective apportionments. Well, think f that: Twenty thousand dollars from the hurches of America! Why, that is nothing or us to do! Say we can't raise it? Why, t is only 20c. each from 100,000 members. Ve ought to double the amount and can do t if every preacher and elder will only state o their respective congregations what Church Extension has done and is doing for hurches unable of themselves to build a ouse of worship. Turn on the light and et our brethren and sisters know the blessngs our people are receiving through this God given enterprise. Why, away down here n Texas there are many churches that toay would not have had a house of worship ad it not been through the aid given them y our Church Extension Board.

brethren have never devised any mission enterprise that is bringing greater and more permanent blessings to our homeless churches; and shall we not feel the obligation resting upon us to foster and enlarge our Church Extension Furd? Let us wake up and make a contribution on Church Extension day worthy of our name and numerical strength.

Permanency Means Success.

Our missionary work divides itself into four grand divisions; 1. Foreign Missions; 2. American Mis ions; 3. State Missions, 4. Church Extension.

· Each are of equal importance. Foreign Missions are the ultimatum of all our work. But Foreign Missions succeed only as our work at home succeeds. The foreign work is dependent wholly upon the success of home work, both state and national, and it seems to me the time is at hand when we are compelled to say that our state and national work depends tremendously upon the success of our Church Extension work.

Twenty-seven hundred congregations without a home! And we wonder why our collections for Home and Foreign Missions are not larger!!

The man who is living in his own house and has a steady job will give largely to charity work when his heart is right. But his brother, who has no home, driven hither and thither, out of work half time, scarcely knowing where the next meal is to come from, has just as good a heart, but gives nothing. Encouragement gives. Discouragement not only fails to give, but fails to create the wherewith to give.

The church that is housed, all debts in the hands of her own brethren, is full of encouragement. When an appeal comes from any of our "boards" she wants to help and does help joyfully. Litt e is gotten and little can be expected from a congregation without a home.

Just a little personal experience. Some years ago the writer was preaching for a little congregation meeting in an old hall in one of our Western towns. Everything was succeeding nicely. But imagine our consternation one Lord's day morning when the janitor reported our furniture ousted and hall taken possession of. The city owned the hall and had rented it for a much larger sum. Prejudice was against us. The only alternative was to move to the operahouse and pay $2 per Sunday with no midweek privileges whatever. Kindred have been the experiences of many homeless congregations.

It is a business investment, a matter of DOLLARS AND CENTS to the work of "preaching the gospel as a witness among all nations" that we help to house the homeless congregations.

When world wide missions ceases to be the ultimate object of our efforts, then it is time to close our doors and turn the work over to those who are in earnest.

Every church must be a workshop, a recraiting office and a collection agency. A workshop to work over and recast the warped material brought in from the world. A recruiting office in which to enlist new soldiers for the royal service. A collection agency to gather funds to push the battle farther on. These have to do with things material. Of necessity, then, she must have a material home.

The building is the problem. "Church Extension" is the solution. The September offering is the opportunity. Let every church take the largest offering in her history at this offering. This is an investment we cannot afford to miss. We must reach the $250,000 mark. We will reach it.

Appeal for the Homeless.

In this county we have over 2,700 homeless congregations. They are not only hampered in their work, but their very existence is imperiled. Seeing this the Church Extension Board has espoused their cause and already rejoices in having provided homes for 865 such congregations. It is a glorious record, but the future work will be more glorious.

This work appeals to our business sense and higher sentiments. When we put our mon-y into this fund it goes on perpetually building churches until Christ comes again. Then we think he will say: "Inasmuch as ye did it to them, ye did it unto me."

Let pastors and elders see that each congregation meets their apportionment, that the Extension Fund reach the quarter million in 1900.

A Building Unites a Congregation.

After 18 years' evangelistic and pastoral work in California, eight of these being used as state evangelist and a very close relation all the time with our state work, I desire to bear this testimony: That only in . ne instance have I known our cause to fail where we have invested in a lot or home for the young church. And this one case was a peculiar one. I know of no earthly consideration stronger than property rights to cement the members of our struggling bands. It seems to be a stackingpole around which we pile our hay. Whatever assists weak churches to possess and occupy a home, even with a mortgage on it, should be fostered by every Christian who holds sacred the best interests of our plea. With this end in view permit me to trust that the Church Extension Fund will receive from all our pastors and evangelists that hearty sympythy and cooperation its business methods as well as its great purpose deserve. That every effort should be had to increase the permanent fund to at least $250,000 by our General Conventions. Such a consummation will advance our cause and give it a firmer footing in a new community than any one thing in our power. R. L. MCHATTON.

The Chain Letter and Other

There was the charity craze, offering membership in the Charity Chain for ten cents and requesting a busy man to return the communication with ten cents and to sit down and make two exact copies of the same, sending to two friends with the same reasonable request, and they repeat the same performance until twenty should perfect the mystic sound, and closing with anxious warning against treaking the chain; and when the $200,000 thus raised is all in the giver's name shall be enrolled, like John Hancock's, where "all nations shall behold it and all time shall not efface it."

There was the nickel-for-every-member novelty, asking five cents from every man, woman and child, and requesting every one to solicit nickels for one week from their friends, and when the sum of thousands shall have been raised money may be sent and the enterprise may be inaugurated and the names of the great multitude of five-centers will be placed in the cornerstone and recorded in a volume for their perpetual fame, and all children are requested to go without candy and all grown people to deny themselves a cigar or ribbon, and the preacher is modestly asked, not only to do this in his own congregation but to pursue the good work in others by correspondence.

There was the Autograph Quilt curiosity—a proposition to all good men and true in every place—twenty blocks, twenty names wanted for each block, to be marked with red thread, ten cents to be contributed with each name, and as the names of distinguished persons will help in selling, "Please get the President, Vice-President, members of the Cabinet and members of Congress to write their names in a block and return as soon as possible."

There was the old method of sending the pastor or some brother or sister who travels and gets $5 here and $10 there and $20 yonder, and the cost of getting it eats up half the sum contributed; the pastor is away from his post, and if he gets enough it is sunk in one place and never heard of again. The last brother who came to see me this way came a thousand miles, saw the inauguration and got just enough to pay his way to Washington and return and did not think it worth while crediting to us in his report of funds received.

We are grieved by these devices. The good people who resort to them are our brethren, most excellent, most devoted, most worthy of help. We feel for them and want to help them. Now, Church Extension meets these multitudinous calls. It looks into such cases as need investigating. By the co-operation of all our churches it provides for such as are worthy.

The Extension Board meets the absolute necessity for a consideration of such appeals and the distribution wisely of such benevolence. By organized and united effort on the part of all a thousand times more is done and better done than could ever be done under the old haphazard method, and the dollar you give helps, not one struggling church, but twenty churches every century and goes on helping for a thousand years.

A Good Mark for Church Extension.

1900, A. D., $250 000; 1905, A. D., $500,-000; 1910, A. D., $1,000,000.

September 30th, 1900, is the date set for reaching a quarter of a million dollars in our Church Extension Fund. If this is accomplished it will mark an epoch in our history. It will be the beginning of a great victory. A quarter of a million in 1900 means a half million in 1905, and a million in the fund in 1910; and even with a fund growing at so rapid a rate as that we would still be unable to meet the demands that would be made upon it. The larger the fund the more liberal the terms of the loans can be made and the consequent greater encouragement to scattered Disciples to organize and build.

In the West the church problem is more and more coming to be the problem of housing the infant organization—the legitimate child of apostolic evangelization.

In this great, growing metropolis of the Southwest of 110,000 people we have five churches. We could double that number in two years if the Church Extension Board could insure loans at low ra es of interest to buy lots and build chapels. There is not a town on this coast of any importance where we could not plant a church in five years if the Extension Fund could solve the house problem. If we had $250,000 in the fund!

There will be no if in this matter after September 30th IF the preachers and elders do their duty to God and the church in the meantime. The obligation is upon us, b ethren! Let us acknowledge our responsibility! Let us no our duty!

The Responsibility Lies With the Pastor.

Shall we reach the $250,000 mark in the fund for Church Extension by September 30th? This is a question for the preachers and elders to resolve. If the churches are given the opportunity and a frank and full statement of the necessity for increasing this fund is made, the churches will respond.

Twenty-seven hundred churches without houses of worship! This is a startling condition. It is an interest we ought to see is changed for the better. Twenty thousand dollars raised in the September offering will help to improve this condition very materially and will make the fund $25 a month. If our churches will reach the apportionment made by Bro. Muckley the quartermillion limit will be reached. If the preachers will do their duty the churches will reach their apportionment. The responsibility rests with the pulpit. Let every preacher do his duty.

"Lend us Five Dollars."

We love the brethren, and in this we are truly apostolic. But love will make its expression in the most helpful way to the object of its love. Our brethren who have no church homes and who are looking to us for help will surely expect dollars and not delays.

The church that is yearning for a house of worship, knows a void that nothing but walls and a roof will satisfy—church house hunger. Could each of us during the next two months visit some growing town where a loyal band of Christians were straining to complete a modest house and they should say: "Loan us five dollars and we will turn it over to the Church Extension Society in a year from now," would we not gladly hand them the cash? The churches exist in reality by the hundreds; will we have fellowship with them or not?

AN EVANGELIST IN CLAY.

Fifty years ago a small boy, a little Londoner, wandering among the garish attractions of old Camberwell Fair, stopped and gazed in wonder and delight at the "Dying Gladiator," represented by a "living statue," who, in white tights, with hands and face chalked and with the aid of suitable drapery gained a precarious livelihood from the public, who rewarded his assumption of various poses by a dole of coppers. The small boy of six stood entranced while the representation lasted and on reaching home, near Camberwell Gate, proceeded to imitate, in his own feeble way, the scene which had been so graphically set before him by the "living statue" at the fair. That small boy was George Tinworth, whose genius has made his name honored and his work admired throughout the world. He is the greatest of all living artists in clay. The son of a poor wheelwright, he was born near Camberwell Gate on Nov. 5, 1843. The "statues" at Camberwell Fair were his first studies in art, which, in spite of the unfavorable surroundings of a crowded and dreary neighborhood, and the no less uncongenial circumstances of his having to assist his father in the wheelwright's shop, became at a very early period in his life quite a consuming passion. He began by cutting out some wooden butter stamps; but, longing to express himself in worthier fashion, he soon began to give his attention to the "human form divine."

YOUNG TINWORTH'S EARLY STRUGGLES.

How this marvelous youth managed to overcome the obstacles which clogged his path I must briefly relate. His early career was a realistic romance. He has himself put it on record in his favorite medium, the terra-cotta panel. This panel represents a youth of about sixteen at work in the wheelwright's shop; but instead of being engaged on an unfinished wheel he is busy at the vice, carving a figure from a block of wood. Fearful lest his father should discover him thus wasting his time, a small boy has been stationed at the shop window to give timely warning of the approach of parental authority, when the forbidden carving will be hastily hidden away and the mending of spokes and felloes reluctantly resumed. But such furtive exercises were far from satisfying, and the young man with his irrepressile longings for better things was adrift on the ocean of life without a pilot, without charts, without even a compass to direct him to the desired haven of success in art. When Tinworth was 18 he accidentally heard of a school of fine art. Intuitively he knew that was where he should go. It was in Lambeth, only the next parish, but what a tremendous gulf was fixed in the mind of the bashful youth betwen a seat in the Lambeth School of Art and that wheelwright's bench at Camberwell! How was it to be bridged? The difficulty was overcome easily enough. The lad took with him a small sculptured head of Handel, his own handiwork, but more than once he stood on the doorstep of the art school and retreated without finding courage to go in. One evening a companion went with him and actually pushed him suddenly right into the room, almost into the arms of the master. Mr. Sparkes, one of the ablest art instructors who ever lived in England, at once discerned in the untutored strivings of the young aspirant the genius of a real artist, and Tinworth was given a seat. From that happy moment his upward career commenced. After about three years' evening tuition under Mr. Sparkes, work at the wheelwright's still being done during the day, Tinworth was admitted to the school of the Royal Academy. In 1865 he won a silver medal and two years later he secured the first silver medal in the Life School: and meanwhile, in 1866, he had a group of figures called "Peace and War in Low Life," accepted for exhibition in the Royal Academy. The scene depicted was one of slum life. It represented two street Arabs engaged at fisticuffs; two little girls were interfering, and a dog stood by, barking at the battle. So far, honor and academic reward constituted his only return for his work. But then came fame and gain. The Paris Exhibition of 1867 did much to revive art in England. A demand for artistic pottery was created and Mr. Doulton, now Sir Henry Doulton, was one of the first to desire to respond to it. Mr. Sparkes was convinced that his pupil was the very man to assist Mr. Doulton in his laudable object. Tinworth at once left the mending of wheels and began the occupation for which he had been longing. There ends the romance of his career. It would be tedious to enumerate the names of the panels which have left his studio high up in the Lambeth Pottery, near the Archbishop of Canterbury's Palace by the Thames and opposite the Westminster Houses of Parliament. These marvelous productions have gone to the ends of the

A GREAT BIBLE ARTIST.

George Tinworth is the first sacred artist in the world. His chief delight is to interpret on clay panels, in wonderful alto relievo, all kinds of Bible scenes and incidents. He does this in his own strong, original and Puritanically simple way, for he is a Puritan, heart and soul, notwithstanding his images and in spite of the fact that they are to be found adorning York Minster, the Guards' Chapel and the Anglican Churches of all degrees, high and low. "When I was a little boy," says Mr. Tinworth, "my mother was always talking to me about the Bible. I paid little attention then, and when I grew up I was a bit wild. As soon as I began to think seriously all her words came back to me and I heeded them. My mother did it." Here is a fine lesson to mothers in humble life. This may well be understood when we know that his parents belonged to the church of which the Rev. G. Clayton was the famous pastor. It was the sanctuary known as "Browning's Church" at Walworth; for the poet Browning was christened there. Tinworth's mother trained the lad to regard all other literature as dross; so that to this day the Bible is the only book which he reads without indifference, and his world of thought is still that which was in his youth peopled from the Bible. The objection of the older Tinworth to his son "wasting his time" was founded on his loathing of "graven images." The artist's answer to the objection is in these words: "I always think of what God told Moses to do. He bade him set up carved images of the cherubim at the four corners of the ark;" and on his panel of Aaron's Golden Calf he has inscribed: "May God preserve England from the worship of images, is the prayer of the imagemaker!" Over in America, in Washington, is a wonderful terra-cotta and Doulton ware pulpit, decorated, of course, with panels of Scripture subjects. A clergyman was visiting Tinworth's studio while the artist was engaged on this beautiful work. On the door Tinworth had put a bird's nest to proclaim: "Foxes have holes, and the birds of the air have nests, but the Son of Man hath not where to lay his head." "That, you know," he explained to the cleric, "is for the bishops and canons to see when they go up into the pulpit dressed in their fine robes." Ten years afterwards Tinworth was rather taken back by the same clergyman turning up at the studio to remind him of the incident, for the clergyman was Dr. Benson, who had in the interval become Archbishop of Canterbury. It takes Tinworth about nine months to finish a large panel, but one—"Going to Calvary"—which only occupied about four months, was bouth at the private view of the Royal Academy for five hundred guineas. Mr. Tinworth's art is his religion. He only in habits a modest little house at Kew and works all day in a dusty skyward studio at Lambeth; but he delivers the gospel messages with the power of a great prophet, and is recognized throughout the Christian world as an Evangelist in Clay.

MORE AMERICANS COME AND GO.

Like flocks of swallows you Americans fly to our shores, and like swallows you flit away from us just as we begin to enjoy the fellowship. The most tantalizing of all flying visits has been that of A. McLean. This much-traveled secretary has been to Constantinople to survey the mission field in the Levant. He arrived in London at eight in the morning, spent a few hours with us and left London at four in the afternoon for Liverpool en route back to America. Pres. Aylsworth, of Cotner University, Lincoln, Neb., is on this side of the Atlantic. He did me and my people the pleasure of preaching a sermon which will ever be recollected with delight. With him were Mr. Griggs and daughter, also from Lincoln. Prof. Haggard is in Europe. But we have a legion of your citizens coming and going. And changes are ever happening, so that I feel the personal environment which at one time seems permanent suddenly alters its aspect. Our young friend, Landon Moore, youngest son of Dr. W. T. Moore, is about to sail for America to take up a university course in science in his native land. His genial presence will be missed. If any of our American friends contemplate repairing to our shores during September will particularly heed the notice that our convention is to he held in Liverpool, at the Upper Parlia-ment Church of Christ, Sept. 18-22? We have never in any annual conference been without the attendance of some bright Westerners. May some few at least be able to grace this coming occasion. Bro. Bicknell and his prosperous his prosperous occasion. Bro. Dickuell and church will be delighted to greet any.

GAINS 12 LBS. ON CHANGE OF FOOD.

When a change of food can rebuild a man 77 years of age, it is evidence that there is some value in a knowledge that can discriminate in the selection of proper food to rebuild the body. A few months ago the physician attending Warren S. Johnson, of Colfax, Cal., 77 years old, that death from old age would soon claim him. He suffered from general weakness and debility.

Au old lady advised him to quit coffee and drlnk Postum Cereal Food Coffee and to eat Grape-Nuts breakfast food every morning. He took the advice, and has gained 12 pounds. Says he is as well as he ever was, and takes long trips in the mountains, which he has been unable to do for a long time.

There is a reason for this: in the first place, coffee acts as a perfect nerve destroyer on many highly organized people, both young and old, and many people haven't the knowledge to select nourishing, healthful, rebuilding food.

Both Postum Food Coffee and Grape Nuts breakfast food are made from selected parts of the field grains that contain delicate particles of phosphate of potash and albumen. These two elements combine in the human body to quickly rebuild the gray matter in the brain and in the nerve centers throughout the body.

Direct, sure and certain results come from their use and can be proven by any person that cares to make the trial. Both the Postum Food Coffee and Grape-Nuts is kept by all first-class grocers.

The Lands of the Long Day-VII.

AFLOAT AND AFOOT IN LAPLAND.

Facing the Tana River that July morning, with a roadless wilderness before me, through which I must travel for more than three hundred miles, it did not seem that a bicycle was really a desirable accessory for the journey. The mercury stood at the freezing point-and so did I. Mingled snow and rain fell so heavily that the opposite bank of the river was but dimly visible. My two boatmen stood ready beside their craft, an unstable canoe twenty feet long and twenty inches wide, in which it would be practically impossible to stow a bicycle. I retreated to the house where I had lodged and reopened negotiations with the Lapp who had been interested in my wheel the night before. He was an enterprising sort of fellow and was evidently captivated by the idea of owning a bicycle. After much dickering, for a Lapp is Jew, Italian and Yankee all in one at trading, we made a bargain by which he got the wheel while I got a complete suit of reindeer furs and a considerable sum in cash.

The chief garment in the suit is the coat, or "frakke." It really is a frock; goes on over the head like a sweater and comes down to the knees; ties at the neck with bright-red strings and has red cuffs. For ordinary summer wear the frakke is made of heavy blue woolen material; for winter of reindeer fur, but the trimmings are always of the most brilliant red. There is no noticeable difference between the costumes of the men and the women except the gowns of the latter are sometimes two or three inches longer and are almost always worn without a belt, whereas the men always wear a belt, to which is attached a daggerlike knife in a sheath.

So I donned my fur gown and prepared for a wintry journey. It made me laugh inwardly to picture to myself that skirted Lapp, with his square-topped cap and curl-pointed shoes, scorching down the road to Vadso on an American bicycle (when he learns to ride it). But it made him laugh outwardly to see "der Engelskman" clad in Lapland furs, with plaid stockings projecting below and a rough-rider hat above. Perhaps after all he had the best of the laugh. But it has been a very comfortable outfit and daily and hourly have I blessed the good fortune which enabled me to dispose of the wheel and to acquire furs, at the point where the former became an almost impossible burden and the latter a practical necessity. The Lapp is welcome to the distinction of having what is now, I suppose, the most northerly bicycle in the world.

The Tana River is a stream of considerable size, in width averaging upwards of two hundred yards in this part, with a swift current and frequent rapids. One man stands in the bow of the canoe and another in the stern, each with a ten-foot pole, and together they push the boat upstream with surprising speed, even ascending rapids where, to the unpracticed ye, it seems that no boat could possibly climb up. Nowhere have I ever seen more skillful boatmen. Traveling among these people is not without certain hardships, but there are at least two compensating circumstances. One can feel perfectly safe in a boat in the midst of any sort of rocks or rapids if the poles or paddles are in the hands of Lapps; and one can leave his personal property scattered about as he will with complete safety from theft. No Yankee trader can be keener than a Lapp in driving a sharp bargain, but they are honest to the last degree.

The first day on the Tana River we made nearly thirty miles in seven hours of travel. The rain and snow continued, and from the standpoint of physical comfort the journey was as disagreeable as a sleigh-ride, which everybody knows is the most uncomfortable form of amusement ever devised. Low hills rise gradually from the river bank, untimbered but covered with a thick growth of birch bushes which are bright with the new green of early spring. There are in the river many nets for the capture of salmon, and not infrequently we pass the hut of a Lappish fisherman.

Late in the afternoon we approached a group of half a dozen huts which my boatmen said was as far as they would go. I must get another boat and other men. The matter of changing boats and getting new men to carry me on my way proved afterward to be a source of many delays. Generally the men do not like to go far from home and it takes them two or three hours to prepare for such short journeys as they are willing to undertake. They are the slowest moving creatures I ever had dealings with, and if there is any way of stimulating them into speedy motion it is still unknown to me. The advan'age of these frequent changes is that it brings the traveler into contact with many people and enables him to see the inside of many houses. There is scarcely a Lapp hat on my route half across Lapland whose hospitality I have not shared and by whose hearth I have not sat-sometimes longer than I

Landing at this settlement on the river bank the men drew up the boat and without knocking carried my baggage into one of the houses. It seemed a miserable hovel, but it had two rooms. one of which I had all to myself that night, while the family (a dozen or so) occupied the other. I was now on the soil of Finland, for the Tana River is here and for a hundred miles farther the boundary between Norway and Finland, but the inhabitants of this region generally speak Norse, in addition to their native Lappish, and in the former language negotiations were conducted for the continuation of the journey on the morrow. Pending the preparation of supper I tried a few casts in the river for salmon, though the water was so high that the attempt was not only useless but ridiculous.

Supper was brought in by a Lappish maiden. It consisted of the staple articles of die: of this country—rye bread, salmon, milk and coffee. Probably there are no people in the world who are more addicted to the use of coffee than the Lapps. I have heard that they are hard drinkers, but so far have seen them drinking nothing but coffee and milk. My bed that night was of furs and sheepskin; comfortably warm, to be sure, but a sheepskin lacks freshness after it has been used for an indefinite period (especially by Lapps), and it acquires an odor which suggests neither peach blossoms nor new-mown hay.

The menu for breakfast was the same as for supper, exc pt that the coffee was brought in before I was up and the salmon was served raw. This latter delicacy, which is a favorite in the civilized parts of Scandinavia as well as in the wilds of Lapland. I at first scorned, but later learned to endure and even to embrace-with a certain reluctance. The appetite for raw salmon has nearly become a confirmed habit. It was only after persistent effort that I was able to obtain the bare essentials for a morning wash at this "hotel." In general, ablutions are not frequent in this region with the natives. They are, to put it mildly, something less than diurnal. When one makes u e of what they furnish as a towel it is not always certain that the entire process will result in any net gain in cleanliness. Such were the primi ive appointments of this hut, but even here the advance agent of civilization has laid his finger, for a Waterbury alarm clock shone out in nickel-plated splendor from a niche in the log wall.

On the second day's journey up the river still fewer houses were passed. Once we paused and entered a sod hut seven feet by nine with a rounded roof not more than five feet high. A fire was burning on a stone hearth in the center and some of the smoke found its way out at the aperature in the roof which was designed to serve as chimney. Five men sat about the fire finishing a meal. They made room for my two boatmen and me and gave us fresh salmon which we broiled. The proper method is to thrust a stick lengthwise through a strip of fish a foot long, broil it over the fire and eat it from the stick like corn from the cob. I judiciously looked the other way while they washed the coffee-cup before presenting it to me. They meant to do me a great honor, for ordinarily they do not wash the cup at all, but their method of dishwashing was a trifle irregular.

Again, we stopped at a still more typical Lapp residence. It was a one-roomed log but, which my men entered as usual without knocking, I following. The furniture of the room consisted of a fireplace, two homemade folding beds such as one sees in every Lappish house, a table and two or three low benches. The six occupants of the room were disposed upon the floor and the beds. Two women were knitting and an old man was tying stones in birchbark for weights for salmon nets. All were bundled up with caps and mufflers as if for a winter journey, though the room was hot to suffocation. My men calmly took possession of the fireplace and made coffee. Then we drew forth our provisions-canned goods, dried reindeer, beef and black bread- and ate dinner. Cream for the coffee and milk to drink were obtained from our hosts, for no Lapp family is so poor but that it has always an abundance of milk, but otherwise their hospitality consisted in allowing us the freedom of the premises.

According to the Lapp code of etiquette one is perfectly free to enter any man's house without invitation or announcement, but to the guest's liberty of entrance corresponds the host's perfect liberty to let him alone after he has entered. You may enter without a word and sit by the fire for two hours, and unless you, as guest, take the initiative they will seem as utterly oblivious of your presence as if you were a shadow on the wall. If they are eating a meal you are not asked to join. It is taken for granted that you have provisions with you and will eat if you want to. But if you ask for anything there is nothing in their simple store that is not freely yours-coffee, milk, hard bread, fish, dried reindeer meat, or reindeer skins for a bed upon their floor.

That night we reached Utsjoki, at the point where the river of the same name flows into the Tana. Utsjoki is marked upon the maps as though it were a town. In reality there is only the house of the Landsman (the police officer of a district seventy five miles square) and a church three miles up the Utsjoki River. The Landsman, a pleasant gentleman of Finnish-Swedish extraction, speaking all languages but English, received me in his comfortable little home and treated me as a guest. He said it was long since he had seen any one but the Lapps who live about him, and he was evidently lonely. Following his advice, I decided to leave the Tana River at this point, enter Finland by the Utsjoki River and take the overland route across Finni-h Lapland by way of Euare to

The reader should perhaps be remiteded that Lapland is not a political division, but is the name applied to the territory where, under several governments and speaking several languages, the Lapps dwell. The boundaries of Lapland are therefore rather vague, as the population about the edges is mixed, and as the Lapps on the border have intermarried with their Finnish, Norse and Swedish neighbors, especially the former; but at all events, Lapland includes parts of Norway, Sweden, Russia and the Russian Grand-Duchy of Finland. In addition to their native Lappish, of which there are several quite distinct dialects, the Lapps usually speak the language of the country within whose boundaries they live. Thus those along the Tana River, among whom I had been traveling so far, spoke Norse (Norwegian). After leaving the house of Utsjoki landsman I was soon among these whose only civilized language was Finnish.

At one time and another I have attended interesting services in St. Peter's at Rome, in Westminster Abbey and in Cologne Cathedral in Notre Dame at Paris and in the Duomo of Florence, but it was a still rarer privilege to spend a Sunday morning with the Lapps at the little church of Utsjoki. Up to the sixteenth century these people were still pagans, worshiping various reptiles and having as their shrines sacred stones, usually small enough to be portable. At the larger shrines which were stationary, it was customary for the worshiper who was about to undertake any sort of project to leave an offering. If the undertaking failed it was assumed that the god was responsible and the erstwhile worshiper returned and not only claimed the gift which he had left at the altar, but seized the offerings of other suppliants whose prayers had been more effective. Under this system it was naturally impossible for the shrines to accumulate any great wealth. In the sixteenth century, Trifan, a Russian monk of Novgorod became an apostle to the Lapps, but though the Russian Lapps became nominally Christian at this time the Christianity of the Eastern Church took no great hold upon them. The Norwegian Lapps were converted in the eighteenth century, chiefly through the efforts of the missionary Westen. At present nearly all of the Lapps are adherents of the Lutheran Church, which is the established church of Norway, Sweden and Finland, but many of the ancient superstitions are still maintained to a degree which amounts almost to a perpetuation of the old paganism This is said to be especially the case with the Russian Lapps in the Kola Peninsula and the nomads who vibrate between the Swedish interior and the Norwegian coast, but these I shall have no opportunity to observe.

The church at Utsjoki is a well-built stone structure with a wooden spire and a bell and a seating capacity of about 300. Architecturally there is nothing about it which would be considered out of place in an American town except the absurdly uncomfortable pews and the pepperbox pulpit which hangs in one corner like an oriole's nest half way to the ceiling. Where the population is thin the parishes are of course large, and this one was as large as an English diocese, but the state church sees to it that every parish shall have a decent church building. The minister was a little, black-headed Finn with a big overcoat and a face like a wizard. (The name "Finn" means wizarl, by the way.) I essayed conversation with him, but he could not even speak Norse beyond the remark uttered from the depths of his overcoat collar, that this was "ikke richtig sommer" (no proper summer).

But the chief point of interest was the congregation, which was easily the motliest collection I ever saw in a church. There were not more than forty of them, all Lapps and all clad in their peculiar costumes, of which the men's skirts always seem far too long and the women's far too short. The idea of "dressing up" for Sunday has not yet penetrated this region, for the garments were as ragged and dirty as usual. Some of the women wore bright-colored kerchiefs on their heads; others round skull-caps with ear-laps which tied under the chin, framing the face in an oval window. As it was a cool day, many men and women wore reindeer skin coats, and there is no material known to me which can assume a more woe-begone appearance than an old reindeer skin It loses its hair in patches and hangs in tatters at the bottom. The cream of them all was the deacon who took up the collection. He was an elderly man. thin and tall, as Lapps go. A tangled mass of uncombed grayish hair bedecked his head. A half bald reindeer skin of more than usually melancholy aspect hung loosely to his knees. The oval curvature of his nether limbs was set off to alvan'are by white woolen trousers, secured about the ankle by red wrappings which also served to hold the shoes in place. The shoes themselves, vast, soft and hay-stuffed, spread out at each step like the feet of a camel and the sound of his footfall was like the stealthy tread of a pillowshod burglar. Altogether, the deacon was distinctly good.

The service, which was the usual service of the Lutheran Church, was conducted in the Finnish language and with the utmost decorum. One of my boatmen of the day before was chorister and sang the hymns in a bellowing bass voice. Several of the congregation had brought their own hymn books with them, but they seldom joined in the singing. They are notoriously an unmusical people-a fact which was exhibited even more clearly by the singing of those who sang than by the silence of those who were silent. After a sermon. the text of which was from Matt. 6, but the points of which I failed to grasp, several notices and one or two official documents were read in Finnish and Norse, during which the audience gradually went out

There were three or four huts by the side of the lake at the foot of the hill on which the church stood, and thither we all resorted to eat dinner. Most of the congregation, and I like the others, had brought provisions with them. As we ate I negotiated for a guide and porter to accompany me to Enare. The business proceeded slowly, but by the time the people began to disperse to their homes I had found a man to go with me part way.

The journey from Utsjoki to Enare cannot be described in detail. The distance is sixty miles and it took two and a half days to cover it, on foot most of the way, but using a boat whenever a lake or stream lay in the way. There are not more than half a dozen dwellings between the two places, and in general it was necessary to secure a new guide at each hut to take me to the next. One fine night we traveled by the light of the midnight sun, fiading no place to sleep until half past three in the morning. A day and a half it rained and was cold. One full day we tramped through marshes where the mosquitoes found us a rare treat. And on the evening of the third day we reached the civilized and Christian home of the Forestmaster of Enare, whose hospitable roof covers the genuine oasis in the desert of Finnish Lapland. W. E. GARRISON.

A Good Chance for Some One.

There is always a good chance for the preacher who is ready. Many a man could add a third to his salary and make his work a half more effective by taking a thorough course with Prof. Ott in the Drake University College of Oratory at Des Moines. Is.

Why Missionaries are Blamed.

Perhaps a word might be added to what Bro. Tydings has well said on this subject. Is it a strange thing that people who have only words of complaint and condemnation for the work of the church at home should take advantage of an opportunity to find fault with its efforts abroad? It has been said that some of the missionaries of France and Germany have secured discrimination in favor of their converts through the foreign consuls representing their own countries. If this is true there is reason to believe that some of the native Chinese not thus favored have been embittered.

But even admitting the accuracy of the statement, it touches only one and that a very small class of missionaries. The great body of missionaries in China is composed of men and women who scrupulously consider the rights and interests of all the native classes, who are exceedingly careful to obey all the local laws and who are very careful to do nothing which would excite popular prejudice or hostility. They are men and women carefully trained and selected, and very often under the direction of strong and capable superintendents. Their efficient work to a great extent depends upon the good will of the natives, and that they should do anything to array these people for whose souls they are working against them is absurd in the extreme. Besides this these missionaries are people of culture and intelligence and their actions are controlled by the spirit of Christianity, which is a sensible spirit. They have sacrificed all home interests and associations for their work and devoted their lives to the judicious work of the Christian ministry in China. In addition to this our missionaries as a class are gentlemen and ladies both in feeling and deportment. We should give no more weight to the cynical attitude of worldly Americans and Europeans who have traveled in China than we do to the criticism of the church from the same class of people at home. In their travels as curious sightseers they see little of and care less for the work of Christianity among the heathen. Either through skepticism or indifference they are prejudiced against all religious enterprise at home as well as abroad. They are always ready to say sneeringly that pagans are better as pagans than they would We have always encountered be as Christians. this spirit at home, but it has never affected the power of the gospel-neither will it abroad. such criticism find no place in our Christian sympathy. The Boxer movement is neither antimissionary nor anti-Christian, but anti-foreign. The fanatical Chinamen have not stopped to consider whether a foreigner was a missionary, a merchant, a railroad engineer, a doctor or an sador. It has been foreign enterprise which has aroused alarm and hatred against all outside movements.

B. B. Tyler's Letter.

Reference was made last week to the sermons of C. B. Newnan at Fountain Park. Since that letter was written he has been heard in Bible studies. He has been the leader in a study of the epistles to the church in Thessalonica and the Galatian letter. Charles B. Newnan is a good preacherhe is better teacher.

Suffer a word of exhortation and encouragement at this point. The young preacher is laying a foundation for a career of constantly enlarging and prolonged usefulness who is now cultivating the teaching faculty. Strive to be a teacher of the Word. Let your preaching be instructive. Do not fail to impart information, excite thought. in the minds of your hearers. It is not true that ignorance is the mother of devotion. Determine now that you will make those who attend your ministry intelligently Christian. The general ignorance is appalling. It is your businness to displace this ignorance with intelligence. Make quality rather than quantity your motto. Better instruct a few than exhort or appeal to a crowd. This is enough on this point for the present.

The summer assembly, permit me to remark in the next place, has its mission. It has come to stay. The educational value of its work is great. Specialists appear on its plat'orms both to entertain and instruct. The religious, intellectual and social features of these gatherings are happily united. Four years ago I was at the Fountain Park Assembly. Lo k on that picture, then on this. There has been improvement. The people have been helped. They have been to school. The summer assembly is the people's school. That man is a benefactor who organizes and carries on one of these latter-day unique institutions. The American people are but beginning to really live. Up to this time they have been digging, toiling, drudging, skimping. The pioneer work has, in the main, been done. Some time can now be devoted to recreation and self-culture. Let the best be provided for the people.

Since my last letter two things have happened at Fountain Park worthy of special mention. Dr. H. O. Breeden and Bishop C. C. McCabe have visited the Park and spoken to the people. The former gave a valuable lecture entitled "The Crisis of the Hour," and another lecture on his travels in the Orient. The latter was illustrated. Bishop McCabe gave his famous lecture on "The Sunny Side of Life in Libby Prison." He also delivered a sermon. The bishop attended the Lord's day morning service and acted very much as if he was one of "the brethren." The words of these good men and the pleasure of personal fellowship with them will not soon be forgotten.

This is a good place in which to speak to you about our educational enterprises. There are facts indicating that we are awakening to the importance of this part of our work. There is the best of news from Drake. If the fact that Dr. and Mrs. E. J. Toof, of New Haven, gave $25,000 to Drake University has been mentioned in our papers I have not seen it. The gift was made just before the death of Mother Toof. The outlook from Eureka is good. Progress has been made recently that is cheering to the friends of the institution. This college was never in so good a condition as at the present time. We have been fairly thrilled by the recent achievements of Hiram. The destiny of Hiram College is settled. The continued life of Bethany - "dear old Bethany"-is assured. The Divinity House in Chicago is more largely attended this summer than at any previous period. A recent bequest assures the erection of a Divinity Hall and warrants an appeal for endowment. This will come. The College of the Bible, Lexington, Ky., has determined to put an agent in the field to secure endowment. John T. Hawkins has been engaged to do this work. The brethren in Kentucky know and believe in him. He is a good man for this work. The Disciples in Kentucky ought to endow this institution, and I believe they will do so. Do not forget the text: "He that giveth let him do it with liberality." This manifestly increasing interest in our educational work is one of the encouraging signs of the times.

Here is a question-it may have occurred to others than the writer; hence it is answered in this place. Knowing you as I do I suspect that it came into your mind. The following is the

"In what sense, for what reason or reasons and to what extent did you mean, in a recent issue of the CHRISTIAN EVANGELIST, to commend 'The Reign of Law,' by James Lane Allen?"

I. As a work of literary art. The first chapter is on hemp-its cultivation and care. The story of the hemp is a parable in which is pictured the soul-experience of David; the hero of the volume

II. The choice of words and the construction of sentences are about perfect. The delicate touches, the descriptive passages, show the hand of a master. "The Reign of Law" leaves but little to be desired along this line.

III. The book is a most interesting psychological study. The hero of the story at first was a believer. He not only believed in God and in his Son Jesus Christ our Lord, but he received as absolutely correct the conception of the gospel generally entertained by the Disciples of Christ. David's faith gradually disappeared. He became, as a result, an unhappy man. He met and became acquainted with a pious young woman. She declined to discuss science or theology. She believed in God. She had faith, too, in David. Her heart trusted. Her experience satisfied her. Through her gracious influence the downward career of David was checked. The picture of David's experience is fine.

The history may not be full and accurate. The declarations of David can no more be defended than can the speeches of other unbelievers. He was wrong in his life, and as a result the thoughts in his soliloquies and conversations are wrong. David confounded theology and religion-a common confusion of thought. Read what David says as the words of an earnest man who is off the track, as the hero of "The Reign of Law" was when he uttered them, and they can do no harm.

W. W. Hopkins has written a tract of 64 pages entitled "Public and Private Rights." Have you seen it? I am glad that Bro. Hopkins has written on this subject. It is evident that he has given much thought on the subject and that he has convictions. There can be no mistaking his earnestness. He believes what he says. His book is not to be read as fiction. The work is dedicated "to all those persons who are seeking the freedom, elevation and moral, material and spiritual welfare of their fellowmen." The author is a believer in the Initiative, the Referendum, the Recall and the Single Tax theory: i. e., that all moneys needed to carry on the government shall be collected by taxes levied on land. It seems to me that this is a scheme by which the rich man, as a rule, will be released from the payment of tax and almost the entire burden will be thrown on the farmer. Our author, it is true, says that "the fear that this system would work a hardship to farmers is wholly imaginary," but I cannot get away from that "fear." An elucidation of this would be a good thing. I would like to see a system devised that would compel the multi-millionaire to pay his part of the expenses of the government if he is not now doing so. Read in one way the little trea ise is pessimistic; read in another way it is optimistic. The author has no doubt that the adoption of the theories of the school of political economists to which he belongs will introduce the millennial day. When thoroughly believed it is a doctrine "full of comfort." As one reads these pages he is inclined again and again to use the interrogation-point. But this is the kind of writing to read-writing that excites questions, writing that excites thought; wherefore, read W. W. Hopkins on "Public and Private Rights." B. B. T.

The Tohee Industrial School.

Three years ago I began this work feeling that cha work was needed among the thousands of lored people who have settled in Oklahoma. By aking appeals to the brethren I received $465, th which I built a building that will accommote about 150 children. On the 28th of June at I left home to get six sewing machines and I n proud to say that I have the promise of them also collected in cash $150, for which I wish to press my thanks to our brethren. I return me now to continue my work until we shall we a school second to none in the United States.

Fountain Park Assembly.

This Assembly is located near Remington, Ind. met this year on July 28th and closed on Aug. th. Remington is a town of 1,500 and is surunded with a large number of town and country urches. It is in the midst of a very productive rming district and the farmers are well to 60. The roads are good at this time of the year, and indreds and even thousands come here to enjoy tellectual feasts provided for them.

There is a fine summer hotel here; a number of sleges and others have their tents, but most of ose who attend seem to drive, and come and in their wagons and carriages to their great tisfaction and enjoyment. It is said that on ord's day, Aug. 5th, there were over 3,000 people esent. Of course, during the week the audiences are not so large, but those present seemed therested and attended all the services and charges.

Robert Parker, of Remington, is the president d seemed to be the main man in giving direction ld managing the whole affair. He impressed e writer as an active business man; in fact, aded down with business, and yet was greatly terested in the cause of Christ and willing to vote a good share of his time to advance the ingdom of God. He seemed to look after every stail in the management and tried to bring comort and happiness to all. Everything about the ost beautiful grounds was pleasant and inviting, ad the hotel was clean and comfortabe. It is ertainly a lovely spot for the farmers and townssople of this part of the state to gather a few ays during the hot summer days for recreation, estruction and rest.

The program was an admirable one and those resent seemed deeply interested in all that was resented. B. B. Tyler, late of New York City, semed to be the manager of this part of the ssembly, and I. B. Newnan, pastor in Detroit, fich., was Bro. Tyler's assistant. This made a trong team. Each of these lecturers delivered bout twelve sermons and other addresses, which fere full of instruction. Among other speakers rer B. J. Radford, Eureka, Ill.; Geo. F. Hall, lecatur, Ill.; H. O. Breeden, Des Moines, Ia.;

Bishop C. C. McCabe, Ft. Worth, Texas, and quite a number of other addresses and such features that commended themselves to those who attended. There were concerts, music, recitations, views, etc., etc. These things made the program restful and a pleasure to all. The lectures and addresses on Bible themes gave the audience an hour of instruction. Then came that which amused and entertained, and all seemed nicely blended together. These plain and yet intelligent people seemed to be very happy and grateful for the splendid program rendered. The writer is under obligation to Bro. Parker for his kindness, and when permitted will certainly return to Fountain Park and enjoy another Assembly.

Iowa Notes.

Sunday, September 2nd, is the day set apart for Church Extension.

I hope that Iowa will do her part to make up the $250,000. A congregation counts for but little unless it has a house in which to worship. We have in Iowa 53 homeless congregations, and how to save them is a serious problem.

A good offering for Church Extension will help to house these congregations.

The very hope of securing aid from this fund has inspired many a church to erect a building, and when the building was completed it was found that the money was not needed. Many a church has been saved in the nick of time by the aid of Church Extension.

It is business in Christianity and in is business to take a collection whenever the time comes.

Do not forget Church Extension and Muckley, of Kansas City, on Sunday, Sept. 2nd.

We are planning to entertain a large state convention Sept. 3rd to 7th.

There is no more delightful place for the state convention than the University Church, Des Moines.

M. A. Hitchcock is chairman of the entertainment committee and will be glad to hear from you if you expect to attend.

Pastors, select a good delegation. Urge your Bible-school and Endeavor Societies to send representatives.

Plan to come early and stay until Friday noon. The Friday forenoon session will be one of the best of the week.

Delegates from the great Endeavor Convention in London will be present and tell us of that meeting.

You will want to hear Prof. C. C. Lockhart's Bible lectures each morning.

There will be good music. W. E. M. Hackleman, of Indianapolis, will be in charge of it.

Don't forget to bring a railroad certificate, so you may return home on one-third fare. Railroad agent will attend the convention on Thursday, and that day only, in order to sign your certificates.

When you reach Des Moines take a University Street car and go direct to the University Church, on the corner of 25th and University Avenue.

The entertainment committee headquarters are in the church parlors.

Lodging and breakfast will be furnished free. Dinners and suppers served at the church—25 cts.

We would like to see every pastor in the state at the convention and a representative from every church.

Illinois Notes.

The seventh district convention meets at Fairfield, Sept. 46, and it is hoped that a large number of Disciples may attend. The district is in good shape, having $100 to begin the new year, and an evangelist should be employed. Turn out, brethren.

The eighth district convention meets at Marion, Sept. 13-16. The place is Marion and the evangelist, J. J. Harris, has done a noble service. Come, brethren, in large numbers, to hear his report and arrange for his permanent and liberal support. He is truly great in all his service.

The state jubilee meeting is at Bloomington, Oct. 24, and the program will be distributed in September. The committee has a royal feast in store and we have the best report yet rendered. The church at Bloomington is making great preparations to entertain a large body of Disciples and it will be the greatest assembly in the history of our state. The Coliosum Bullding, seating over 3,000, is at our service, and Hackleman will have charge of the music. Yes, come.

The Central Passenger Association gives a onefare rate to Bloomington, but will sell tickets on Oct. 1st and 2nd only, good to return including the 6th. The Western Passenger Association will sell tickets the 1st and on through the convention on the certificate plan and they will be good three days after the convention to return. The fare is one and one-third. Inquire carefully of your railroad agent.

A large poster announcing the state meeting will be mailed each church early in September to be hung in a conspicuous place in the church building. Plain directions concerning railroads and other matters will accompany the poster. Prepare to come.

Illinois Day, Nov. 4th, is the time to make offerings to state missions. Plan for its observance.

The selected route for Illinois people to Kansas City is the Chicago & Alton road.

Exchange, Aug. 15.—C. W. Stevenson, of Mt. Vernon, assisted by the writer, closed a 15 days' meeting at this place last Friday night; 10 were baptized. Bro. S. is a forcible speaker and a logical reasoner, and is calculated to do much logical reasoner, and is calculated to do have good for the cause of Christ. The small band of Disciples at this place are very zealous and determined, and we expect much good to be done here. The writer and H. N. Hays are each preaching here once a month. By great sacrifice and hard work we are just completing a com-modious house of worship. We have only seated it temporarily and will be pleased to hear from any one having pews or chairs, new or second-hand, to sell at a bargain. We have a good Sunday-school and Christian Endeavor here and our people are awake and at work in earnest.

May God help usand bless us in our efforts to build up his cause here and elsewhere is my prayer.—

Christian Science in Omaha.

The citizens in Omaha have recently been receiving instruction in Christian Science. Some of the physicians having instituted legal proceedings against members of this sect for criminal neglect; the congregation availed themselves of the opportunity occasioned by the excitement to enlighten the minds of ignorant citizens. They announced a lecture by Judge Ewing, of Chicago, a member of their national board of lectureship. The Judge came, he lectured, and I suppose made many converts. Our largest operahouse was packed from stage to pigeon loft. The Scientists know how to advertise. Neat invitations were mailed to every prominent citizen. The streets were full of announcements. Posters as big as showbill were put up wherever one would hang.

The lecturer was wise. He said nothing about the philosophy of Christian Science. He talked beautifully about domestic, social and political economy and closed by saying that Christian Science was the star that watched over the Babe of Bethlehem.

But this is not the end of the story. Two or three of our brethren felt that some attention should be shown this pseudo-philosophy. Bro. W. E. Harlow, of Parsons, Kan., was in the city at the time, having just closed a meeting with our Walnut Hill congregation. The operahouse was rented and Bro. Harlow announced to answer the Judge on the following Monday evening. Did space permit we should like to give a synopsis of the lecture. The vagaries of Mrs. Eddy were shown to be in conflict with the Bible and true science. He admitted many of their cures and then showed that they were all effected through suggestion.

I do not believe that any one who heard this lecture will ever become a Christian Scientist. It is well known that Bro. Harlow has made a special study of suggestive therapeutics. Every community affileted with the Christian Science fad should have him. Do not be afraid of him. His demonstrations based upon the theory of J. R. Hudson gives the only rational explanation of the cures wrought by the Scientists.

"I am the vine," said the Savior, "The fruit bearing branches are ye; All that ye ask shall be given, If ye are abiding in me Gracious and sweet is the promise, Eternal and steadfast and true; But if you are not so abiding, What means this glad promise to you?

He that remembers God's statutes, To Him loval service will give: "He that believeth," said Jesus "In Me shall eternally live. Jesus is the resurrection, The life and the truth and the way; But if you believe not his teachings, What mean to you these words to-day?

He that will follow in meekness The path that the Savior once trod Shall in the light of his glory Be brought with each step nearer God: Knowing these things you are happy, If bravely you follow them, too; But if in forbidden paths stumbling, What comfort can they bring to you?

High in the eternal heavens Are marsions of jewels and gold, Christ is their light, and His radiance Sheds blessings and pleasures untold; Joy, and forgiveness, and honor Await those wao've loved and been true, But if in your heart you've ne'er loved Him, What share in His joy is for you? Quincy, Ill.

Contentment: Retrospection and Anticipation.

JOHN S. MARTIN.

Contentment, simply defined, means satisfied; though it is a word expressing something vague, or indistinct in that sense, as there seemingly is very little if any satisfaction to be found in human nature. However, if there is such a thing as contentment it is a state of existence having a time allotted to it either in the past or in the future, and possibly sometimes in the present; though mostly in the past. We look into the past and mentally recall a time or state of existence wherein we think we were happy, though it is more than likely that we did not think so then. The habit of retrospection is common and there are but few who do not indulge the mind in its backward flights.

"How oft does the heart in its noiselesss beat Move slow as it dreams of the vanished past; How oft does the past and the present meet To speak of the hours too cherished to last.

The joys of the future we never o'ertake The joys of the present fly tauntingly fast, And like hurrying snow flakes lost in the lake, Joys only abide in the depths of the past."

Qr, if in our backward glance we fail to call to mind the joys that are supposed to be there, we look into the future and see or seem to see in the dim distance a time when we may be happy. For after all contentment is only a synonym for happiness, and the words happy and happiness could be used quite as often in its stead; unless the word contentment is used to express a state of resignation (as some have used it; that is, persons have said that they were contented, when in fact they were only resigned), thus putting the word to a use en tirely foreign to its meaning.

If the habit of retrospection is common, that of anticipation is just as much so. The children even at the mother's knee are looking forward to a time to be happy; for I have often heard them wish, with a sigh, that it was to-morrow, and on being asked the reason would say: "O, 'cause I could have such a nice time." And when the morrow would come they would be wishing just as eagerly that it was some other time. We are all children yet; only a little older grown. The boy is always wishing to be a man, and is ever looking into the future for happiness; and he looks so intently all along his journey to manhood for pleasant and happy circumstances to come on the morrow that he misses those of the present and finally he sees or thinks he sees that the years of joy and the chances for happiness have slipped into the past, the beautiful past. Nor can he stay them if he would.

"They are slipping away, the sweet, swift years,
Like a leaf on the current cast; With never a break in their rapid flow, We watch them as one by one they go Into the beautiful past.

As silent and swift as a weaver's thread. Or an arrow's flying gleam; As soft as the languorous breezes hid, That lift the willow's long golden lid, And ripple the glassy stream.

And while these years have been gliding by it may be that they have gone smoothly, with scarcely a ripple to disturb their quiteness, or it may be that they have been full of storms and rough places; nevertheless, they were swift years and might have been enjoyed. But now that manhood's years have come and manhood's cares are upon him we find him ever wishing to be a boy again; that he may live over the joys of boyhood and improve the opportunities for happiness that he let slip by during that period of his existence; little thinking that what appears now to have been opportunities then were not such; for if he were a boy again he would see the same circumstances as he saw them then, or as a boy sees them, and would not have a man's capacity for their enjoyment.

"So we look adown the past, or within the future peer, Till we miss the many joys that around us hover near."

Some may think they are contented, and they probably are so far as thinking so is concerned, but it is more than likely that the discontent is only dormant, for if they are questioned closely concerning everyday life you will find that there is something wrong. There'll be a regret or a sigh or a wish; but surely something. A regret -it may be for lost opportunities, a time when by doing differently the whole life might have been different and happiness assured. Or possibly it is for wrong doing or for not doing good when good might have been done; and I doubt not that-

"We ofttimes think of the past
With feelings of regret,
And mentally view those scenes We never can forget"

The sigh-which one of us can say there is not a sigh in the heart. It may be for the lost and unforgotten, for the fair form that sleeps on the hillside far away, or for the child that was-> carried out to slumber Sweetly where the violets lie;

but a sigh there is, and you will find it in the heart of those who are apparently happy and contented, as well as with those who are not so fortunate as to be able to hide their sorrow. And so on through the various phases of human existence it is there; and you'll find a minor note in the song of the most cheerful.

And the wish: it is hard to define ins what a person would wish for; but I believe it would be difficult to find a person tha did not wish that things were differen from what they are. Some haven't house room enough, and too much furniture, or else they have too much house room and not enough furniture. The farmer has to much stock and not enough lard, or else too much land and not enough stock, and h thinks to better himself by selling out an going away to where he can have mor territory-where he can have things as h wants them. And in so doing he ofttime make matters worse instead of betterin them. So he sells out again and moves back And so the world wags; people are con tinually changing from one thing to an other and are scarcely ever, if at all, satis fied. And when we look about us we d not wonder that there is this general dis satisfaction amongst intelligent, rations beings; for even the beasts of the field which are generally held up to view as a example of contentment, are not altogethe satisfied. At least it would seem so; fo we know, or at least we may judge by thei actions, that most if not all of them woul rather be on the other side of the fence The grass looks greener and fresher an taller on that side than it does on their side and they are anxious to get to it. birds of the air are continually flittin from one tree to another; each and ever perch looks better than the one they are o and it is but natural that they should see that which looks better to them. 'Tis i with humanity. There is continual change each and every one seeking that which or seems brighter and better. And after all, is it not better so? Is it not that which leads onward and upward? I remember once when standing on a river bridge I ha a splendid view of the surrounding country On one side was the city with its numeror elegant residences and fine churches at public buildings, with their surrounding gardens of beautiful flowers; and stretchin away into the dim distance along the river bank as far as the eye could see arose th all chimnies of the mills and factories hich supplied the people with things eedful. It was a beautiful sight, but I ad just left it, and it had not seemed so uch so then as now. On the other side the river lay a quiet, beautiful valley, tted here and there with clumps of ishes, and just beyond the ground arose in entle undulating slopes toward the range mountains that seemed to form a comect wall between it and the setting sun. ne vale was beautiful, the mountains were cturesque, and everything as far as the e could see looked lovely. I crossed to e valley, saw the bare spots, the decaying getation, the dead branches of the bushes, d I began to think that it was not such a autiful place after all. But looking ward the mountains I saw that they still mained beautiful. So onward I went and ward I climbed till, fatigued, I sat me wn on a piece of broken rock to rest and ok about. I saw nothing but broken bits stone, upturned roots of trees, decaying gs, briars and brambles, with scarcely a fe place to stand or sit. And now lookg back I saw far below me the quiet lley, beautiful once more, and I began to ink that quiet valleys and beautiful places re just a little way beyond.

"Every year is just like last year—
Though for novelty we seek;
Shady places at the picnics
Always lie across the creek.
So, a long life's winding roadway
The same mystery we con;
Phantoms of our dearest wishes
Lure us always farther on."

Back on the bridge again I could see the I spires of the city on the one hand and mountain peaks on the other, and the I saying:

"All that you see in the city is MAN; All that you see in the country is God," s brought forcidly to mind. But I do think that in all the city or in all the intry there was a single creature that s contented. With the animals—a uggle for safety, freedom, food, or the ner side. With humanity—a continual uggle for supremacy, or for the daily nts of life. Man toils that he may gain alth; he wants wealth that he may gain wer; he wants power that he may be ppy, and this seems to be the sole aim of nkind, each in his or her way seeking it which comes to but few. And too en the struggle is given up before a fair rt is made toward the goal. But when look about us and see the changes that ever taking place, the onward march of e, the ceaseless struggle of humanity to p pace, with but little progress and too en a backward step, we cannot wonder the weak growing fainter and even the ong losing courage. But on we go, weak strong together.

e pass along life's way, and while the years
, one by one, into the gulfing past, many changes come, it sometimes seems t there is no immutability.
places that were once familiar ground
w unfamiliar in the passing years, il at length, we scarcely recognize m as the places that we knew and loved.
friends that once were ours become estranged, nove to distant places and are lost,

Or answer the imperious call of death, And bid us all their final last farewells. Ourselves grow into something not ourselves, And what we were becomes a memory— Becomes a memory only. In despair We cry out: "Nothing keeps itself unchanged, But everything, alas! is mutable.

The sunset glow is ever changing;
The clouds are scattered, but to come again;
The rainbow gladdens the heart but a moment;
The flowers bloom but to fade;
Their petals are scattered and trodden upon;
Loved ones are taken from us;
Friends prove false and love betrays;
The demon of doubt springs into the mind
And in anguish the spirit cries:

"Is there no Utopia where mortal's fond dreams Are realized ever, and life's what it seems? Where roses are brighter and sweeter each morn, Whose bloom is perpetual, with never a thorn? Where dear ones we love and clasp to our heart, From our fond keeping shall never depart? Where affection is truly an amaranth fl wer, Whose glow grows warmer and purer each hour? Where friends are all true and never betray, And discord comes not to darken our way? Where mortals ne'er pay for that sad primal fall—Or, is the trail of the serpent over us all?"

If there is such a place there must needs be a way thither, and it cannot be gained in a day. These who would find this Utopia must bear their part in the toil of life; those who would pluck the rose must take the thorn; those who are tempted must resist; those who have burdens and are weary must endure unto the end; those who have loved ones must lose them and grow sad; those who have wealth must learn that "riches take unto themselves wings and fly away." We must all learn that there are many ups and downs along life's road, many rough places, many bright ones; but all must pass to the rear; things lovely shall droop and perish. But is there nothing to come from all this? Is there no life from death? Must we drink but to thirst again?

Listen! a voice comes from the hills and vales of a far-away land and the voice is nigh unto every one of us: "I have meat that ye know not of; my meat is to do the will of my Father which is in heaven." But whose is the voice? 'Tis the voice of one who "spake as never a man spake." 'Tis he of whom it is said: "He spake as one having authority, and not as the Scribes and Pharisees." 'Tis Jesus of Nazareth, Jesus at the well. "He that drinketh of this water shall thirst again." Have we not drunk and thirsted again? Have we not partaken of all that the world can provide and are still hungering and thirsting? But Jesus saith: "Whosoever drink eth of the water that I shall give him shall never thirst, but the water that I shall give him shall become in him a well of water springing up unto eternal life." He that believeth on me hath everlasting life. I am that bread of life." I am the living bread which came down from heaven; "if a man eat of this bread he shall live forever, and the bread that I will give is my flesh, which I will give for the life of the world." Shall we not, with the woman of Samaria, say: "Give us of this water that we thirst not:" "give us of that bread which shall make us alive?" Truly, this is the only fount which goeth not dry-which hath no change-the gate to that Utopia where the Christian's hope is realized. And those who seek for contentment will find it only beyond this gate. "I am the way and the life," saith the Master. "Come unto me, all ye that labor and are heavy laden, and I will g ve you rest. Take my yoke upon you and learn of me for I am meek and lowly in heart and ye shall find rest unto your souls. For my yoke is easy and my burden is light." There remaineth, therefore, a rest to the people of God." "Let us labor therefore to enter into that rest." Let us not strive for that which is unattainable in this life; but let it be our aim to so live that we may reach a higher plane and a greater degree of happiness each and every d v of our existence than we have ever attained in the past. Then, like the flowers that bloom for a day and scatter their petals at our feet, yieling only sweet perfume when trod upon, shall we feel that we have made the world brighter and better for having lived. Virginia, Ill.

A Fly's Wings.

Most respectable insects have two pairs of wings, but a fly has only one pair, with a scallop on the rear edge of each, showing that in earlier days it had "openers," even if they went into discard later. scallops are called "halteres," or balancers, and it is the theory of some that they help to steer the fly. They say that when the starboard balancer is clipped off, the fly goes hard a-starboard, and vice versa. But under each of these scales is a globular process, with a long tube fringed with cilia, believed to be sensitive to odors. These globular processes pump air into the nervures or veins of the wings and keep them taut and stiff, for thin though the wing may seem, it is really a double texture. Perhaps clipping off the balancer lets the air out of the wing and so disables it. A fly is able to saunter along through the air at the rate of five feet a second, but when it is in a particular hurry it can go about thirty-five feet a second, which is a two-thirty gait. Its wings beat the air at about the same rate of vibration as the piano string E, first line of the treble staff; but that is not its only means of audible expression. When it gets excited and cannot break away from the fly-paper it makes its thorax vibrate at a higher pitch. You have heard that Campanini could sing high C with chest voice. He could not, but a fly with its feet stuck fast can. Harvey Sutherland, in Ainslee's.

The City of Pekin.

Pekin is about in the latitude of New York City, the size of Philadelphia, and as dirty as Constantinople. It comprises four cities in one; its shape that of the letter T, the top toward the south. The "southern city" is three miles north and south by five miles east and west, surrounded by a wall forty feet high, forty feet thick at the bottom and thirty feet on the top, and contains the Chinese population and the most of the business section.

The northern or Manchu city is four miles square, surrounded by a wall fifty feet high, sixty feet thick at the bottom and forty feet across the top, the side walls being continued about six feet and crenelated. The wall is built of large bricks and filled in with soil. The brick sides are not more than six feet thick. Within the Tartar city is the "Imperial City," two miles square, in which a large proportion of the officials dwell. This is surrounded by a brick wall twenty feet high and six feet hick, capped with a yellow tile roof. Within the Imperial City is the "Forbidden City," in which are the Palace and the residences of the eunuchs. This city is surrounded by a wall thirty feet high, crenelated at the top, with towers at the four corners and over the gates and is one mile square.

The streets of the Chinese city are from ten to forty or fifty feet wide, those of the Tartar and Imperial cities from ten to sixty feet wide and those of the "Forbidden City" -about like the others. The large streets are built up in the centre two feet above the sidewalks so that the water easily runs from the street to the sidewalk and thence to the sewer. The streets are all unpaved and are either covered with dust to a depth of two or three inches, or with mud to the depth of six inches to a foot. Between the sidewalk and the cart drive there are cesspools in which all the dirt and water are thrown, and this accumulation is used to sprinkle the street twice each day. The sewers are cleaned each spring, their contents being piled up on the sidewalk until dry, then used to build up the street.

The houses are all one story high-or nearly so-and look not unlike a lot of dilapidated pig-sties. They are built of bricks, pieces of bricks or both. Usually the corners are of bricks, the panels being of half bricks covered with a lime plaster The roof is of tiles and is supported by a wooden framework. Each house and court is surrounded by a wall, partly for privacy, partly to keep out thieves; these walls are from six to ten or fifteen feet high and built like the house. The windows and doors are paper.-Isaac Taylor Headland, in the Delineator for September.

The Acme.... Smelting and Refining Company

Offers to Investors for a Short Time Unequaled Advantage

IT IS A WELL-KNOWN FACT

That a custom smelter, properly equipped and operated, is the most certain source of revenue in t mining business.

ITS SUCCESS

Is not contingent upon the output of any one mine or group of mines, but draws its support from a lar number of mines in the district where it is located. There are 100 producing and paying mines with convenient distance of our smelter site and at least 200 more would be developed if there was a cast smelter conveniently located to which ore could be shipped for treatment.

A CUSTOM SMELTER

Bears the same relation to mining that a grist mill does to an agricultural district, with the prof greatly in favor of a custom smelter. The usual net profits of a custom smelter are about $3.00 per ton.

WE HAVE GIVEN YEARS

Of careful study to our plans and know that we are warranted in our undertaking—the erection of custom smelting plant. Risks which exist in all ordinary mining operations have been carefully eliminate from our plans. We have water, fluxes, an inexhaustible supply of ore and a clear field.

WE CONTRACT NO DEBTS. OUR MOTTO IS: CASH or NOTHING.

A CUSTOM SMELTER HAS THESE ADVANTAGES OVER AL KINDS OF COMMERCIAL BUSINESS:

- The product of a smelter invariably sells for cash.
- The ore smelted is ample security for the expense of smelting.
- Profits are always large, often reaching 50 per cent. annually on the par value of the stock. 3.
- 4. Charges for smelting are always collected before the "matte" or refined ore is delivered from t smelter.
 - 5. A custom smelter has no bad debts.
 - 6. A gold smelter's out-put never fluctuates in value.
- 7. A gold smelter is absolutely independent of any financial stringency, business stagnation, politic disturbance, or other calamity which jeopardizes all ordinary classes of investments.

Our Board of Directors is a Guarantee of Safety to all Investors. -It is composed of

The Lion's Sister.

ARRANGED BY J. B. ELLIS.

When Prince Giglio fled from the palace he morning after he knocked down Valoroso XXIV. with the warming-pan he was very clad to get a comfortable place in the oach, for it was cold and snow was on he ground. At the first stage there came very ordinary woman with a bag under er arm who asked for a place. All the nside places were taken, but Giglio said: I will give up my place to her rather than he should travel outside with that horrid ough." So he sprang gayly upon the roof nd made himself comfortable in the straw. When one of the travelers got out at the ext station Giglio took his place again and riving out his name as simple Mr. Giles alked to the woman. At last she said: My dear Gigli-Mr. Giles, you are a young nan and have nothing to do but to improve ourself. You may find use for your nowledge some day when-when you are vanted at home.'

"Madam!" says he, "do you know me?"

"I know a number of things," says the ady. "May be I have given magic rings to ertain princesses. I advise you to stay at he next town, study and remember your riend to whom your were kind."

"And who is my friend?" says Giglio.

"When you want any thing," says the ady, "look in this bag, which I leave with ou, and be grateful to—"

"To whom, madam?"

"To the Fairy Blackstick," says she, flying ut of the window. Giglio thought he had een dreaming. When he came to the town e took the bag and went into the inn. On pening the bag what do you think there vas? A blacking-brush and a pot of Varren's jet! So Giglio laughed and blacked is boots. Then the bag gave a little hop nd he went to it and took out 1. A tableloth and napkin; 2. A sugar-basin full of he best loaf sugar; 4, 6, 8, 10. Two forks, wo teaspoons, two knives, a pair of sugarongs, a butterknife, all marked "G;" 11, 2. Cup and saucer; 13. Jug full of decious cream; 14. Saucepan containing hree eggs nicely done; 15. One-fourth ound butter; 16. A brown loaf; 17. Black ea and green; 17. Large teaurn and boilng water. And if he hadn't enough now or a good breakfast I should like to know ho ever had one? He took a modest lodgg apposite the school, sat down and worked ery, very hard for a whole year. "Mr. iles" was quite an example to all the tudents. He never got into any disturbnces. The professors spoke well of him nd the students liked him, too. He took ll the prizes. All his fellow-students said: Hurray for Giles! Giles is the boy! urray!" I could make a chapter of this I were like some writers, but I like to cram my measure tight down, you see, and give you a good deal for the money.

One day after the examinations Giglio invited some of his friends to the inn, having previously dressed himself in a complete suit of armor, three ostrich feathers in a gold crown, a cuirass and a pair of spurs, all of which he had found in his bag. He declared to them that he was not Mr. Giles, but Prince Giglio. As they were feasting upstairs on the balcony of the inn trumpets sounded near and the marketplace was filled with soldiers; his royal highness looking out recognized the Paflagonian banners. Giglio exclaimed, on beholding their leader: "Whom do I see? Yes! No! It is Captain Headzoff. Ho, Headzoff! knowest thy prince? We have had many a sport together."

"I' faith, we have had a many, my good lord," says the captain.

"Tell me whither march my Paflagonians?"

Headzoff's head fell. "My lord, a soldier must obey orders. Mine are to help King Padella, and to seize wherever I should light upon him—"

"First catch your hare! Ha, Headzoff!" exclaimed his royal highness.

"Should light upon Giglio, the prince," Headzoff went on, with indescribable emotion. "Alack that I should say it! My prince, give up your sword! We are 30,000 to one."

"Give up my sword!" cried the prince; "Giglio give up his sword!" And stepping well forward on the balcony the royal youth without preparation delivered a speech so magnificent that no report can do it justice. It was all in blank verse and lasted three days and nights, during which not a single person was tired or marked the difference between daylight and darkness. The soldiers cheered tremendously when occasionally-once in nine hours-the prince paused to suck an orange which came out of the bag. At the end of this truly gigantic effort Headzoff flung up his helmet and cried: "Hurray! Harray! Long live King Giglio!" Such were the consequences of having employed his time well at college. It was then that the herald rode up with the news that King Padella held the beautiful Queen Rosalba a captive and that he had ordered her to be cast into burning oil. Giglio was greatly agitated by the news. "Didst thou see her flung into the oil?" he

"Faith, my good liege, I had no heart to look and see a beauteous lady boiling down!"

"The ruthless ruffian, royal wretch!" exclaimed Giglio. The noble Giglio could not restrain his tears. But hark! "Haw-wurraw-wurraw-aworr!" A roar of wild beasts were heard. And who should come riding into town, frightening the boys and even the policemen, but Rosalba! The fact is, when the herald had ridden into Padella's amphitheater the lions made a dash for the gate, gobbled up the six keepers in a jiffy, and away they went with Rosalba on the back of one of them; and they carried her, turn and turn about, till they came to the city where Giglio now stood in the army. You may think how Giglio rushed forth to hand her majesty off her lion. He knelt (most gracefully) and helped the princess; he flung his arms about the forest monarch and laughed and hugged him and cried for iov.

"Yes," said the Fairy Blackstick, who had come to see the young people. "But do you know why you and everybody finds Rosalba so charming? It is on account of the magic ring which I once gave Angelica and which Rosalba now wears. For the gentlemen must love the lady that wears it."

"Rosalba needs no ring, I am sure," says Giglio, with a bow. "She is beautiful enough in my eyes without enchanted aid." "Oh, sir!" said Rasalba.

"Take off the ring and try," said King Giglio, and resolutely drew it off her finger. In his eyes she was just as handsome as before. And the Fairy Blackstick said: "Bless you, my children. A little misfortune has done you both good. Without it Giglio would scarcely have learned to read and write. Without it Rosalba would have thought herself too good for Giglio."

"As if anybody could be good enough for him," cried Rosalba.

"Oh, you darling!" says Giglio; and so she was. Just then the herald came rushing in: "My Lord, the enemy, Padella!"

"To arms!" cried Giglio.

"Oh, mercy!" says Rosalba, and fainted, of course. Giglio rushed forth to the field of battle. But this humble pen does not possess the skill necessary for a description of combats. Padella was at last overcome and his army routed. They tied Padella's hands behind him, bound his legs under his horse, set him with his face to the tail, and in this fashion he was led to the dungeon. Valoroso (who, by the way, has been dethroned for a considerable period) was also clapped into prison. These ex-royal personages were sent to the House of Correction, and thereafter were obliged to become monks of the severest Order of Flagellants, in which state by fasting and by flogging they exhibited repentance for their past misdeeds.

As Giglio and Rosalba were riding to church to be married the Fairy Blackstick appeared upon a pony at the window. She exhorted Giglio to deal justly with his subjects, draw mildly on the taxes, and in all respects to be a good king. "Why is Fairy Blackstick always advising me?" says Giglio, testily, "and telling me how to manage my government? Does she suppose I am not a man of sense?"

"Hush, dear Giglio," says Rosalba, "the Fairy has been very good to us, and we must not offend her."

So they were married. And everybody cried: "Hip, hip hurray!" "Long live the king and queen!" Were such things ever seen? The bells were ringing double peals, the guns roaring most prodigiously. Headzoff was flinging up his wig and dancin a jig for joy. As for Giglio, if he kissed Rosalba once, twice — twenty thousand times. I'm sure I don't think he was wrong. And the Fairy Blackstick sailed away on her cane and was never more heard of in Paflagonia.

W. F. RICHARDSON.

THE SEVENTY SENT FORTH.*

According to the chronology adopted by the International Lesson Committee, which is probably the correct one, Jesus returned to Galilee after the Feast of Tabernacles and almost immediately set out on a tour through Samaria and Perea. ending at Jerusalem at the Feast of Dedication in December. It was his final farewell to Galilee, the scene of most of his works and teachings. But five months, or six at most, remained before he should accomplish at Jerusalem the supreme purpose of his coming to earth, the dying for the sins of men. These months could not be spent in Jerusalem, for the enmity of the Jewish leaders was too pronounced. Galilee no longer welcomed him as of yore, and Samaria would not even allow him to lodge over night as he passed through on his way to Judea. So he must needs turn toward the east and journey for a time through the province of Perea on the eastern side of the Jordan. The people of this region had known but little of Jesus, since he had merely passed hastily through it, if at all, on his way back and forth between Galilee and Judea. Besides, the population was of mixed blood and there was a considerable Gentile element in its cities and villages. The Master determined to spend a time among this people and offer to them the gracious tidings of the coming kingdom, which had been rejected by Julea and Samaria and even Galilee.

The time was so short that he could spend but little of it at any one place, so he concluded to send messengers throughout the country to prepare the people for his coming. Many of them would remember the days of John the Baptist's preaching, and it would be welcome news to them that the kingdom of heaven which he proclaimed was now at hand. Jesus chose seventy of his followers for this service, perhaps with the memory of the seventy elders whom Moses chose to assist him in mind. The twelve he kept with himself that they may lose nothing of these days of tenderest and closest fellowship and instruction. The commission given to the seventy shows that their mission was but temporary, and they are never mentioned in subsequent history. They were sent out by twos. This seems to be the rule with all the early preachers of the gospel. Peter and John, Paul and Silas, Barnabas and Mark, went forth to their joint labors in the gospel. It has been found wise in modern missionary work to send forth the laborers in companies. There is a power in human fellowship that makes work easier and more successful. Two sticks make a better fire than one. If one can chase a thousand two can put ten thousand to flight. Where two are working side by side zeal burns brighter, courage rises higher and toil is lightened by sympathy. It is good for us to find companions in Christian service who are of kindred mind and heart. Above all it is wise to make the Master our comrade, for in his holy company the yoke becomes easy and the burden light.

They were to go preaching and praying. He new that the surest way to make them earnest aborers was to set them to praying for the world that needed the gospel. Missionary prayers are very costly. Livingstone began praying for Africa and it cost him his life of suffering and his death of loneliness. David Brainerd prayed for the American Indians and his prayers cost him years of hardship among the tribes of redskins. Mrs. Graybeil prayed for the wretched people of India and it cost her the life of her beloved daughter Mary. When the church gets to really praying for a lost world it will cost her thousands of her sons and daughters and millions of dollars. When we bear on our hearts the burdens of souls we will be ready to say to the Lord of the harvest: "Here am I: send me."

He sent them forth as lambs in the midst of wolves. Heathenism is cruel and martrydom has ever been the ultimate testimony of the missionary. China will not be converted unto Christ until her soil has been hallowed by the blood of those who counted not their lives dear unto themselves. From the graves of those who are even now laying down their lives as a sweet sacrifice unto the Lord will he cause to spring up in that spiritual wilderness the flowers of Christian faith and love. We will weep over the sufferings of our devoted missionaries, but we will rejoice in the sure reward of their fidelity.

The messengers were instructed to carry no purse for money and no script or bag for provisions. They must trust to the people for whom they brought the glad tidings to supply their needs. The laborer is worthy of his hire. They that preach the gospel are to live of the gospel. It is no charity to pay the preacher for his services. It is simple justice. The preacher who is content to receive money as if it was given for alms is degrading his high calling. Let him do his work in a manly way, and let his brethren know that he trusts them to supply his temporal wants, not as charity, but as his rightful dues, and he will not want the necessiti s of life for himself and his family. When they had entered a city, therefore, they were not to go from house to house asking for shelter at a beggar, but to find a convenient home and there remain, the faithful providing for all their wants. To such a home cheerfully given them the blessing of the "son of peace" would come. How many such "preachers' homes" are there throughout the world, where the servant of God has been ever welcome. Surely, the blessing of the Master rests upon them all.

They were to salute no man by the way. This probably refers to the tedious and elaborate greetings common in Oriental countries which would consume much time and lead to wayside gossip of no profit. Time was precious and there was much ground to be covered during the few weeks before them. He would have them attend strictly to the task before them. Hence this injunction, which they no doubt found it expedient to obey. There were not to regard the prejudices of their countrymen in the matters of food and drink, but were to eat such food as was provided by their hosts. The Jewish distinctions of meats and drinks were about to be abolished, and as they were now on semi-heathen soil they might anticipate the larger spirit of the gospel. They were to heal the sick and declare the near approach of the kingdom of heaven. If any of the cities rejected them they were to shake off the dust of that city from their feet and it would stand as a reproach against its people in the day of judgment. A fearful responsibility rests upon those who hear unmoved the messengers of the Lord Jesus Christ. If those shall hardly stand in judgment who heard the tidings of the coming kingdom, how shall men of to-day escape the awful consequences of indifference or disobedience when they hear daily the proclamation of the finished gospel of God's grace?

How long this mission of the seventy lasted we do not know. It probably ended when Jesus had passed through Perea and went on up to Jerusalem, to the Feast of Dedication, in December. But Luke tells us, in direct connection with the story of their sending forth, of their return and report to Jesus. They came with exultation, tell how that even the demons had been subject to them when they spoke in the Master's name. The Savior shared in their joy and clared that he had witnessed the overthrowing the power of Satan through their faithful min try, and it was to him a prophecy of the fir defeat of the enemy of souls. Their pow should be further augmented, as they should after years go forth to proclaim the gospel of t risen Christ, and all the serpents and scorpions unrighteousness should be unable to harm the After his resurrection Jesus repeated this promiand it was literally fulfilled in their minist among men. But there was danger that their e ultation of spirit might lift up their hearts wi pride and make them forget that the first p pose of the divine grace was to redeem the from sin. So Jesus utters the significant warni so sadly needed in every age by those who won make signs and wonders the chief factors in ligion: "Notwithstanding, in this rejoice not, th the spirits are subject unto you; 'ut rather! joice because your names are written in heave To be a child of God is the highest honor earth or heaven. "Many will say to me in the day, Lord, Lord, have we not prophesied in t name, and in thy name have cast out demoand in thy name done many wonderful worl And then will I profess unto them, I never kn you; depart from me, ye that work iniquit Grant unto us all, dear Lord, to be among the whose names are written in heaven!

TOPIC FOR SEPTEMBER 2.

SEEK SOIILS.

(Luke, 15:1-10.)

It might be better if we should use some other expression for our attempts to win people to Christianity than "seeking souls." Perhaps our Savior's own expressions would be better-"catch men," "fishers of men." Jesus deosn't talk a great deal about "souls." And some of the passages that are translated "soul" would better be "life," as, for example, that famous saying: "What shall it profit a man if he gain the whole world and lose his own life? . . . What shall a man give in exchange for his life?" "Life-savers" would be better than "soulseekers." There is little use, however, to cavil about words, except that soul is such an unreal word, while life, people, men and women, are such real, concrete terms. Let us always try to be real.

Whenever we are unreal we drive men and women away. They demand nothing more than sincerity. One danger, therefore, of good people is that they shall hold at arm's length the very ones they hope to gain. Not so with Jesus. He was so real, so sincere, so true, that the publicans and sinners drew near to him and heard him gladly. Whenever this class of men are glad to be near a certain man this is testimony at least to that man's sincerity and reality.

Here, then, is the very first requisite, is it not, of a man-finder? He must be honest. No professionalism in Christianity; no airs nor cant phrases will go down with publicans and sinners. They want straightforward honesty, open-faced free dom, out-and-out sincerity. A man amongst men, on even terms with men, must the fisher of men be.

Next, a man of infinite forbearence must be be. One who should get impatient with his sheep for straying; one who should belabor a poor wardering lamb when found; one who had no tolerance whatever for the erring, could not, as the great man winner, be a friend of publicans and sinners.

Even further, such a one must be a kind leader, gentle and generous. One noteworthy fact about many of these wandering ones, these who need seeking and saving, is their native kindliness and generosity to their friends. Indeed, it is this very quality of willingness to share with one another all they have that leads them often astray. The genial, the generous, the socially kind, are often the very ones who are led away by their own kind impulses. In dealing with such no fisher of men dare deal harshly.

No narrow views of life, either, must one have in trying to assist those who have seen much of life. Paul is the best example aside from our Savior of one who sought to win men by a large knowledge of the world. He was a cosmopolitan-a man who understood men and knew how to become all things to all men. He took large views of life. No narrow conceptions of men and things were Paul's.

The most enduring perseverance is also characteristic of those who seek and save. The woman swept diligently in her search for the lost coin. She removed rugs and rushes from the floor, took away all obstructions of household goods, went into corners and with lighted lamp peered into crevices. If half the patient perseverance were exercised by us in trying to save a drunkard or a gambling boy! If, instead of impatiently inveighing and "failing not to declare the whole counsel" of some scathing denunciation, we should exercise our limbs in following, our heart in sympathizing and our patience in winning, the world would come quicker to the Master's fold of eafety.

Much could be said of the joy to be found in eeking the wandering, joy in the home-coming

"Bible Study Sunday."

The second Lord's day in September (September 9) will be observed by thousands of pulpits as "Bible Study Sunday." The suggestion originated with the American Institute of Sacred Literature and is being gladly adopted by pastors in all churches. This date has been selected because it stands near the opening of the school year and the time when churches are taking up their work afresh after the summer vacation. Its special purpose is to awaken a more general interest in the systematic study of the Bible.

There is need of this. The great majority of professed Christians content themselves with such knowledge of the Bible as they pick up in Sundayschool, in the church and from desultory private reading. As a consequence, the average church member is appallingly ignorant of the Bible as a whole. The masses outside know almost nothing of it. I think there is good ground to suspect that "our own people" are not as familiar with the Scriptures as were our fathers and mothers. Like the Bereans, they searched the Scriptures daily. Our mothers had the Bible open before them while they attended to their domestic duties, and it was quite the custom of our fathers to carry the Scriptures with them as they went to their daily tasks. This habit of Bible study made them a tremendous

The chief address on "Bible Study Sunday" should set forth the relation of Bible study to the Christian life and the work of the church. It should set forth what the Bible is not, what it is, and how to use it. It should awaken a fresh interest in Bible study and indicate some of the methods by which the common people may pursue it. I think the Disciples have something to say on these matters which the people need to hear very frequently.

It is intended that this Sunday service should be followed immediately by the organization of church Bible classes, under the direction of the pastor and elders, or those whom they may select. These may be week-day classes in afternoon or evening, adult classes in the regular Bible-school, or in connection with the C. E. Society and the C. W. B. M. Auxiliary. The Bible course in the Bethany C. E. Reading Courses furnishes an admirable outline for this work. There are three handbooks in this course; the first gives a bird's-eye view of the entire Bible from Genesis to Revelation, outlining each book in regular order; the second gives a bird's-eye view of the life of Jesus and an excellent summary of his teachings; the third gives the historical setting of the prophets of Israel, and briefly outlines the prophetic books.

According to the new schedule of these courses October, November and December will be devoted exclusively to Bible Study; January, February and March to the plea and history of the Disciples of Christ; April, May and June to the study of missions—Home and Foreign. I shall be glad to furnish further information upon application to any who may desire it. The purpose of this brief article is to insist upon the general observance of "Bible Study Sunday," the second Lord's day in September. J. Z. TYLER.

The Work in Illinois.

No city can be well understood without a bird'seye view. In the business of the Master a general view of the field and work is as necessary. While we pause a little, while the sultry summer days go by, it is a good time to take such a general view. Nor is this for the preacher only, but for the thinking Disciple, whose brains are valuable in the King's service. No state is susceptible of a higher or more diversified cultivation than our own. We have a great country section as full of intelligent, thrifty people as are to be found anywhere. The beautiful villages and small cities are so many open doors. Our larger cities invite our greatest skill, wisdom and spirituality. With a hundred thousand workers for the Master, what can we not do if we put ourselves at it as we should.

EVANGELISTIC.

- 1. Home force enlargement This is a healthy. thrifty, permanent growth. It blesses both the saved and the laborers. But plans must be made. It is time. Occasionally a meeting springs up of itself, but usually it is the work of united, concentrated, prayerful energy of the church. We have but few preachers who could not preach the gospel in a clear, intelligent, forceful way that would enlighten both the church and the unsaved. But he needs the hearty support of the church. He must have its earnest prayers, its financial help, in securing tracts, plenty hymnals and printed announcement cards, etc., and its personal influence and time in distributing literature and giving personal invitations and help to the unsaved. But most of all, remember the wisdom and help which only can come from the Silent Partner in the work of life. All these things require forethought and plans.
- 2. A special evangelist. Occasionally it is best to get the strongest man possible to aid the pastor in a most vigorous effort. This makes a stronger force and sometimes with great profit, but a church that expects to live on this kind of growth all the time makes a mistake. The church's duty in the meeting is largely the same as with home force.
- 3. Enlargement beyond the church. churches ought to be constantly formed and cared for. There is room for at least twice as many churches as we have in the state. While we have such cities as Alton, Aurora, LaSalle, Peru, Ottawa, La Monte, Moline and others with ten thousand or more people without a Church of Christ our evangelistic work is not done. In reach of nearly every present church is a place that ought to be cultivated. Our state work ought to be better supported that it might enter these great centers of population.

PASTORAL.

- 1. Regular ministry of the Word. The tide tends toward stronger pulpit work. "Preach the Word" will always be the leading business of the preacher. A random talk will not serve for the sermon very often. Hard study is a weariness to the flesh, but better study hard than pack your goods so often. Contented, energetic, prayerful work will win. The people must depend on the pulpit for the proper teaching on most of the great problems of the day. God's Word furnishes their solution.
- 2. Spiritual cultivation. How to train people to fear, love and walk with God-this is the greatest work. Much of it comes from the pulpit, much from house-to-house visitation. The prayermeeting is especially for this purpose. Religious papers and books help. Higher study of God in nature, revelation and redemption helps.
- 3. Spiritual activity. He who expects to live for himself soon dies. The church knows how to work as it never did before. Sorry its energy is not equal to its knowledge. The care of the poor and sick, looking after strangers, sociability in the house of God and at home mean much to the church. The Sunday-school, Christian Endeavor, C. W. B. M. Auxiliary, all furnish opportunities for active co-operation and personal service for the Master. Are we planning for all these things?

EDUCATION.

- 1. Eureka College. Every Disciple in Illinois who knows himself is interested in Eureka College. I have not seen much mention of it in the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST recently. But it is still in its place, doing its great work. The past year showed a larger attendance than for several years. A splendid class was graduated in June. Most of these expect to enter business or a secular profession. But the ministry was represented as it has been nearly every year for half a century. H. G. Bennett goes to become the pastor at Carbondale, the seat of the Normal of Southern, Illinois. S. E. Fisher becomes the pastor at Gibson City, Finis Idleman at Dixon, and Clifford Weaver and wife go to Japan as missionaries. The other graduates will fill, I believe, useful places in the church whe ever they may live.
- Its finances. No Christian man can be as happy as he might be who owns an acre of Illinois soil and does not do something towards the support of Eureka College. Some five years ago a strong effort was made to put Eureka College on a better footing. It was done. Encouraged by our success, Ohio and Iowa both pushed forward their educational work to a much better basis. Is it not now time for us to push to the front again? We are abundantly able. There ought to be at least $130,000 turned into this great work in the next two years. This would give a progressive working basis for years to come. What do you say to this, brethren?
- 3. Our young people. It is estimated that in the Churches of Christ in this state we have at least 10,000 young people of college age. They have influence over 5,000 friends of college age. At least one in ten of our young people will go away to college. At least half of these should go to our own college. It is folly to say that Illinois with more than 100,000 Disciples cannot furnish money and pupils enough to support properly a first-class college. We want our children to grow up spiritually strong as well as intellectually strong. Their strength will not mean a great deal either to themselves or to the cause of humanity unless they do. The only way to conserve and develop their spiritual life is by furnishing the college, the faculty and a Christian atmosphere for them. This we have at Eureka, and have had for many years, and the character of have had for many years, and the character of preachers, teachers, business and professional men sent forth fully confirm the plan as both wise and indispensable. If souls are as valuable as we are taught they are, let us look a little after the culture of our children. Send them to Eureka College. They will find as kind and competent teachers, as happy and healthful surroundings, as can be found anywhere, all things J. G. WAGGONER. considered.

 Flooding the World With Gospel Light ***

The ultimate object of all missionary work is to flood the world with Gospel Light. At the basis of all, in a business and material sense, lies our Church Extension Fund, which insures permanency by housing every infant church. Organizing churches and Sunday-schools is but pitching the tents of the scouting party. There is no use talking about it, an organization and a preacher must have a place to house the people, and the house must be adequate and modern. If the church to the right in the picture above should give only to Foreign Missions, it is readily seen that but one ray of light reaches the Foreign Field. But this congregation is an all-round missionary church, and each year gives to Church Extension, helping to build one church after another, thus making permanent sources of helps, creating new centers, which send out rays of light to Home and Foreign fields until, ultimately, a flood of Gospel Light sweeps across the ocean into Japan, China, India, and the Islands of the Sea, the more quickly fulfilling the great commission: "Go into all the world, and preach the Gospel to every creature."

One of the oldest Baptist missionaries to Burmah, India, contributed $2,000 to the Baptist Church Edifice Fund (the same as our Extension Fund), and accompanied his first $1,000 with the following statement: "I fully believe that $1,000 so expended in America, at the present time, will be four times as useful as if eapended on heathen ground. The little churches among the heathen will hereafter reap the benefit, as well as those for whom it was directly given, by increased gifts from missions thus strengthened in America."

The point is that ALL our churches should give to ALL of our Missionary Enterprises. If a church can give but $100 a year for missions, it ought to be divided among the Boards. All missionary enterprises are equally important. It will be poor policy to go to the Jubilee Aftermath at Kansas City, when our Convention meets next October, reporting large amounts given to evangelistic work, and only small amounts for the Church Extension Fund, which saves and makes permanent the work of the evangelist. And the same is true of Foreign Missions. The evangelist sent out by State and National Societies goes on the ground first, preaches the Gospel and organizes the church. If that church does not build, it scatters and dies. If it cannot build alone the Extension Fund must aid it. The money spent by Home Boards to organize that church is wasted, and another source of supply is blotted out for Foreign, Home and Church Extension Funds.

Let us swell the Extension Fund. We have nearly 2,800 homeless churches. To let them die for want of homes, which they cannot get by their own resources, is a shame and disgrace. When God blesses our preaching with these new missions, is it right to neglect them who are the children of the church? The communities in which these homeless bands are scattered do not and cannot respect us when we allow our missions to languish and die, or else eke out a miserable existence. We should swell our Extension Fund to $250,000 by the close of September. It is but a small part of what we need. Fifty per cent of our missions die for lack of homes. An old evangelist of the West said: "My trouble is not to get an audience, nor people to accept our plea. My trouble is to house the people. The Extension Fund answers this difficulty."

Fruit acids are accounted by hygienists the most important of the elements of the food of man, and of these the acid of the grape is most prominent.

Our National Conventions.

KANSAS CITY, Mo. OCT. 11-13, 1900.

Kansas Cîty will throw wide open her gates to the great throngs. Our churches are making great preparations to provide for the comfort of the hosts that will come up to our missionary gathering.

RAILROAD RATES.

A rate of one fare plus $2 for round trip has been secured in the territory covered by the Western and Central and Southeastern Passenger Associations, for all distances exceeding 200 miles. For places within 200 miles of Kansas City, one and one-third fare on the Certificate plan. For the Trunk Line and the New England Associations one and one third fare. For Texas, one fare. Write to your State Secretary for the latest information about rates.

ENTERTAINMENT.

According to a resolution passed at the Indianapolis Convention the delegates prefer to provide for their entertainment. The committee on assignment will take great pleasure in providing places of entertainment according to the following schedule:

Hotels-American plan, $1 to $3 per day; European plan (lodging only) 50 cents to $1.

Boarding Houses and private homes of the city will make a rate of $1 to $1.25 per day. Lodging can be socured in boarding houses and homes at from 50 to 75 cents per day. Meals can be ob tained at many excellent restaurants from 15 cents upwards.

SECURING A LARGE ATTENDANCE.

The educational value of the convention will be of great importance. It is therefore important that the churches, Sunday-schools and Endeavor Societies begin at once to plan to send delegates. No church in all our great brotherhood should be satisfied to permit the convention to go by without at least one representative. The convention should often be announced from the pulpit, in the Sunday-school and Endeavor Society.

It is extremely important that delegates who purpose coming send names and class of accomo dations desired to the committee at an early date. Delegations desiring hotel headquarters cannot afford to wait.

CONVENTION HEADQUARTERS.

The First Christian Church at 11th and Locust Sts. will be headquarters for enrollment and assignment committees throughout the convention. As far as possible the reception committee will meet all trains and direct delegations to headquarters, and from thence to their home in the city.

PROGRAM SCHEDULE.

C. W. B. M. sessions begin with a reception on Thursday night, Oct. 11, and close Saturday afternoon, Oct. 13. Saturday night will be given to the Educational Board.

Church Expansion.

Church extension is church expansion. Expansion is life and growth. It is activity. It is helping and protecting the weak. It is doing the will of the Master. It is heeding the cry of the lost. We say we are a great people; we should prove our greatness or quit boasting. We have done well in the past, but this should be the best year in our history. Church Extension should have our attention just now. We should reach the $250,000. We must not fail when the goal is so near. My Bro. Preacher, your hand is on the expansion gear; you have control of the extension valve. There is plenty of power in the church back of you. Will you not open the valve and let the steam of liberality flow into this gr at engine that stands ready to move North, South, East and West and bring blessings, gladness and success to the work of the Lord wherever it goes? Now is the time for an heroic effort. A time when a full head of steam should be let on; then Church Extension will go forward by leaps and bounds, and before October 1st, 1900, will have passed the goal of victory. If we do this work and do it quickly and gladly there will be "sunshine in our soul" when we meet in Kansas City. M. J. NICOSON.

CURRENT EVENTS.

General Chaffee, commanding the Amerian forces in China, now in Pekin, has teleraphed the War Department that he needs o more troops. He has with him about six nousand soldiers and twelve hundred manes, and these he believes to be sufficient or all purposes for which this government quires soldiers in China. He understands ell the spirit of the government he repreents; that he is not there to conquer terriry, but to relieve American citizens from ril and, in co-operation with the forces of ther nations, to restore order and protect fe and property until the present crisis is ast. In harmony with this opinion of Genal Chaffee dispatches have been sent from he War Department diverting the troops the way to China to Manila. It is probole and almost certain that the American oops will remain in Pekin at least until the emands which the co-operating powers may ake of China have been met in a satisfacry way. There is a variety of reports as the whereabouts of the Empress Dowager, mperor Kwang Su and other important hinese officials. At the present writing, owever, it seems probable that the Emress Dowager made her escape from the ty before the entry of the allied forces, nd is at Sian Fu, where she has set up a ourt. The Emperor is said to be with the lied forces, which is not improbable. It is so rumored that the Empress Dowager and rince Tuan are prisoners, but this report icks confirmation. The Chinese are suposed to have fled northward.

The offer of Li Hung Chang to negotiate or peace with accredited representatives rom the various governments has been reented by this government, and some of the thers on the ground that he has no credenals that the powers are aware of for acting s the mouthpiece of the Chinese Governent, nor have the conditions yet been comlied with on which this government, in its ote of July 3rd, agreed to conduct negotiaions. The course of the aged viceroy, since he present trouble began has not been such s to inspire confidence in his sincerity and onesty. From present indications there is o sovereign power at present in China, and o government that is capable of enforcing rder and complying with the demands hich have been made upon the Chinese Emire. There can be no negotiations until here is some government to negotiate with at has the strength and the willingness to omply with reasonable demands, and to give ssurance that any agreement it may enter ito will be carried out. At present the Government of China is in chaotic condition and the problem is how to bring order out of this chaos, and to establish a government that will secure the rights of the people of China and of foreign population sojourning there. There is good reason for the powers to move cautiously and to act only on assured information. Special Commissioner Rockwell has just arrived in China and his report of the situation will be awaited with interest. It will perhaps require the action of an international Congress to finally settle the future of China.

The condition of things in famine-stricken India continues to be such as to appeal to the philanthropic and generous-hearted people of every land. The committee of one hundred on India famine relief has received a cablegram from the United States Consul at Bombay, as chairman of the Americo. Indian Relief Committee, saying: "Famine distress is appalling. Thousands will die of starvation unless rescued. Money is needed to buy food and blankets. The suffering from lack of clothing is terrible. Cholera still active. The condition of destitute women and deserted children specially pitiable. Many boys and girls are in heart-rending need." These are facts which make their own appeal to the human heart and conscience. This country has been abundantly blessed. According to the measure of its prosperity it is under obligations to minister to the relief of stricken India in this sore famine. Much has already been done, but much more remains to be done if we are to discharge our duty to these famishing people, our brothers and our sisters in India. Our readers have been invited from time to time to send their contributions through our Foreign Missionary Society, and through the Christian Woman's Board of Missions. These boards have true and responsible agents on the ground who will see to it that the wisest possible use is made of the funds sent to them. But if it is more convenient to cooperate in this work of humanity through other channels, let them feel free to do so. The main thing is for every one, according to the measure of his ability, to help save the starving millions of India. The method of doing this is relatively unimportant as compared with the importance of doing it, and doing it promptly. Why should there not be international co-operation for the relief of India from the perils of famine, as well as for the relief of a few hundred foreigners in prison in the Chinese capital?

Our recent statement concerning the race riot in New York, that such disturbances have their origin in human nature regardless of politics, religion and geography, has been further substantiated by a similar occurence in Akron, Ohio. A negro in that city committed a brutal crime upon a little girl and the people became furious. The mob raged violently during a whole night and in their effort to get the criminal the jail and other buildings were destroyed to the amount of almost $200,000. The life of a child was taken, others wounded and the fair name of Akron was put under a cloud. The prisoner had been previously taken to Cleveland, Ohio, and thus escaped their vengeance. Upon his confession of the crime he has since been sentenced to prison for life and is now at Columcus, Ohio. The local officers became helpless before the Akron mob and the state troops were sent for to restore order- A mob more desperate in their madness has seldom confronted the officials of any city in the United States; but the storm is over and order again reigns in that heretofore quiet city.

The G. A. R. is holding its annual reunion in Chicago this week. President McKinley and W. J. Bryan were each invited to attend and deliver addresses, but for political reasons both have declined the honor. The parade of the naval veterans took place on Monday and that of the G. A. R. on Tuesday. It is estimated that 40,000 veterans were in line in their parade on Tuesday. At this writing a successor to Albert D. Shaw as their commander-in-chief has not been elected, but the honor will in probability fall upon Major Leo Rassieur, of this city, as there seems to be no opposing candidate. Both Salt Lake City and Denver are working to secure the encampment for 1901, and at one or the other of these points will the next gathering be. There is said to be a notable decrease in the attendance of posts this year. Then, too, their ranks are being reduced year by year by death and the year is not distant when they shall be represented only by their sons.

The new census gives to St. Louis a population of 575,238, a gain of 27.35 per cent. over that of 1890. As usual all of the larger cities come short of their claims, yet all show an increase with one exception, Omaha. Chicago that claimed to have a population of at least two millions was over 300,000 short of the mark. And yet Chicago has largely increased during the last decade. It is also worthy of remark that while New York, Chicago and other of the larger cities have increased their population by the annexation of new territory St. Louis has increased her population in the absence of new territory. As a matter of fact the extension of electric railway lines into the adjacent country has prevented her increase from being much larger than the figures given. But St. Louis is not complaining. Her growth has been substantial and healthful and as the figures now stand she is the fifth largest city in the United States with a good prospect for a still higher position in the scale before the next enumeration is taken.

FROM WAR TO DIPLOMACY.

With the capture of Pekin and the release of the foreign population held captive there it is to be hoped that the chapter of war in China is ended, and that what remains to be settled will be accomplished by diplomacy. If there were any doubts in the minds of any concerning the wisdom of the allied forces in pushing forward to the Chinese capital, such doubt has been removed by the fact, now apparent, that the ministers, their official households and other foreigners in Pekin, would have soon been slaughtered by the hostile Chinese. We owe no thanks to China that the ministers are elive instead of being slain, as every effort was made to exterminate them. The wisdom of the United States Government in urging a forward movement to Pekin is now recognized by all. Our soldiers and marines, too, have acquitted themselves with great credit to their country in the way they have performed their part of the work. The European press has not been stinted in its praise of their prowess and efficiency.

But now that the ministers and others have been rescued, and the allied forces are in Pekin, what next? It is evident that much remains to be done. It is to be hoped, however, that it may be accomplished by peaceful methods and by the art of diplomacy. The chief problem before the allied powers now is, not indemnity for damages wrought by China in the past, which will, of course, receive prompt attention, but indemnity for the future. What measures can the civilized governments of the world take to insure China's good behavior in the future? What guarantee shall they exact that such outrages as have been committed and attempted in the past few months will not occur again in the future? This is really the paramount issue that now confronts the powers of civilization in their relation to China. Can the necessary reforms in China be accomplished under the present dynasty? Has not the Empress Dowager forfeited the confidence and respect of the civilized world? She is herself a usurper and has made herself dictator by deposing the legal and rightful sovereign of the empire. What claim can she put forth, therefore, for the continuance of her rule and of those associated with her that the civilized powers are bound to respect?

We are grateful that the United States Government has led the way in disclaiming any purpose or desire to acquire any portion of Chinese territory, and that she has protested from the beginning against any partition of China among European powers. Her example and influence in this respect has had a most favorable influence upon other nations. The true policy as it appears to us would be for the nations to guarantee the territorial integrity of China and to require the Chinese Government to select some one, perhaps Kwang Su, the deposed emperor, whose character and past action would furnish a proper guarantee that treaty rights would be respected and life and property made secure, to act as their ruler, and under whom the reforms begun in China could be carried forward without interruption. If this should require the temporary suzerainty of the powers, let such suzerainty be declared, but if the end to be gained can be reached without such suzerainty, this would seem to us far preferable.

It would seem, therefore, that we are only ready now to deal with the real problem that confronts the civilized world in relation to China. It is one that demands the greatest firmness and the greatest wisdom, with the element of justice, tempered by mercy. Let us hope that our own government, whose course hitherto in connection with this affair seems to have been characterized by commendable wisdom, firmness and the sense of justice, will continue to be such as to command the confidence and approval, not only of the American people, but of all the civilized powers of the world.

CONCERNING THE "BIRTHDAY OF THE CHURCH."

In another place will be found the first half of an article from our Brother D. H. Bays, on the "Birthday of the Church," which is a rejoinder to our former reply to his article on this subject. Not wishing to waste space on matters that are not relevant, we may pass by, without notice, the first three paragraphs in Bro. Bays' article. We have lettered the points to which we desire to call attention, and our replies to these points will correspond therewith.

(a) His reply to the argument on the passage: "Upon this rock I will build my church," is in brief that the word "build" does not mean to "originate." Certainly, it does not. If Jesus had intended to express that thought He would have used a different word. The church, perhaps, originated in the thought of God before time began, and is a part of what is called by Paul His "eternal purpose." But Jesus does declare that the building of His church is a future event at the time of this declaration, and when we take into consideration the fact that the foundation had just been announced, there is no reasonable room to doubt the significance of the term. No amount of definition from dictionaries can obscure the plain sense of the statement. When our brother defines the term "organize" as "supplying with organs," and then raises the question as to whether organs were furnished the church on Pentecost, he seems to be reasoning in a sophistical way. It is not the organization of the church that is under consideration in the sense of supplying it with officials, but its birth, its beginning. When we speak of the church as a "divine organism" we are not speaking of any organization which man may effect, but of the relationship which exists between believers and their divine Lord as their Head. Nothing is clearer than that the project of calling out a people from the world to be known as the church and building them upon the foundation truth announced by Peter lay in the mind of the Savior as a future event, to be progressively realized through the coming centuries and to have a definite beginning at some point of time future to that in which he was speaking. The whole situation, all the concurring facts, the whole stream of divine history culminating in the events of Pentecost, demand this interpretation.

(b) Brother Bays then takes up the ar gument based on the great commission which sent the apostles out into the world to preach the gospel to every creature. This, we argued, was Christ's way of building His church; that the people were to be called out of the world by the gospel and built upon Christ as the foundation. Luke's record of the commission states that repentance and remission of sins was to be preached in Christ's name among all nations beginning at Jerusalem. We argued that this preaching of repentance and remission of sins in the name of Christ must of ne cessity precede the Church of Christ, since it was this very preaching that was to re sult in the formation of the church. Our brother's reply to this is that this passage "refers, not to the beginning of the church but to the beginning of the public ministry of the apostles." This has the appearance of trifling with facts, though our brother cannot mean to do so. He seemingly ignores any causal relation between preaching the gospel and the formation of the church. We assume, of course, that every one would see that Christ's church could not precede the ministry of the apostles, who were to preach repentance and remission of sins in His name. If Brother Bays does not admit this argument would be useless.

- (c) We have the same sort of confusion in his further comment on the instruction giv en to the apostles to "tarry in the city o Jerusalem" until they should be "endued with power." "They were to tarry at Jerusalem," says our critic, "not till the church should be organized, but for a far more impor tant event, namely, till they should be en dued with power from on high, for withou this enduement they never could have car ried out the divine command to 'preach the gospel to every creature," Here, again, ou brother seems to see no connection between the preaching of the gospel with the Holy Spirit sent down from heaven and the begin ning of the church. If the church coulhave begun without such enduement, we d not see why it could not have be carried or without it. It is like locating the birth o this nation before the Declaration of Inde pendence and the War of the Revolution.
- (d) We now encounter something mor serious than illogical reasoning in Brothe Bays' reply. We had said in our forme ply that if the church was established be fore Pentecost, it was established with out the Holy Spirit, and quoted from John 7:39: "But this spake He of the Spirit which they that believed on Him were to receive; for the Spirit was not yet given, because Jesus was not yet glorified." Our brother goes on to quote passages showing that John was full of the Holy Spirit from his birth and that Christ received the Holy Spirit without measure, etc .- facts which we presume were well known to the apostle John who, nevertheless, made the declaration above quoted. Apparently our brother failed to catch the meaning of the argument. Our point was that since the Holv Spirit was not given to believers in that peculiar sense which marks the Christian dispensation and could not be so given until after Christ's glorification, that a church existing before that time must have been a church without the Holy Spirit. There is no avoiding this conclusion. The fact that John and Jesus possessed the Holy Spirit in fullness does not touch this argu-

(e) In reply to our statement, that a church existing before Pentecost was established without the preaching of repentance and remission of sins in the name of Christ, he says: "This may be true, but the fact does not appear. The premise is assumed, not proved." Does not our brother, then, accept our Lord's statement in Luke 24:46,47, that repentance and remission of sins should be preached in His name among all nations, beginning at Jerusalem? Does he not admit that Jerusalem was the beginning-place and Pentecost the beginning-time for this preaching? Why, then, does he say that 'the premise is assumed, not proved," when we affirm that if the church was established before Pentecost it was established without preaching repentance and remission of sins in the name of Christ? Some other church there may have been, for aught our argument proves, but a Church of Christ existing prior to the preaching of repentance and remission of sins in His name could not have been. If Brother B. affirms that it could, then there are fundamental differences in our conception of the church which needs to be discussed before we come to the question of its beginning.

(f) Brother B. declares that "the fact that the name of the trinity may not have been employed either by Christ or John in the baptismal formula by no means proves that repentance and remission of sins was not preached in the name of Christ"-prior to Pentecost, we take it-"neither does it prove that the church was organized on the day of Pentecost." We had supposed, however, that the clear statement of Christ, that the beginning of the preaching of repentance and remission of sins in His name was to be at Jerusalem, and as circumstances show took place on Pentecost, would be quite sufficient to prove the fact. We are not able to give this language of our brother any interpretation that makes it reverent of our Savior's explicit declaration. Perhaps here, too, he has failed to catch the argument and does not intend to treat ightly the solemn declaration of our Lord. We submit that no argument which we we have made in favor of Pentecost as the birthday of the church has been in the least degree weakened by the reply of Brother Bays; whose further arguments we shall continue to examine in another article.

THE HABIT OF FRIENDLINESS.

(Acts 2:44 47; Jas. 2:1-9; Rom. 13:8 10.)
Uniform Midweek Prayer-meeting Topic, Sept. 5.
CENTRAL TRUTH: Christianity begets and fosters the spirit of friendshlp towards our fellowmen which, practiced, crystallizes into habit.

Beneath every habit, good or bad, there lies a principle, true or false. Beneath the habit of friendliness is the principle of human equality and the spirit of brotherly love which Christianity inculcates as one of its fundamental principles. The influence of the religion of Christ upon human relationships is shown very vividly in the picture which is furnished us in the passage from the Acts, where we are told that "all that believed were together, and had all things common; and they sold their possessions and goods and parted them to all, according as any man had need." It need not be argued that this method of manifesting brotherly love was intended to be a fixed rule for believers in all ages. This was not probably the case. The essential point, however, is that under the impulse of this new life, which had come to them through Christ, the spirit of mutual love and mutual care for each other was begotten and took this method of expressing itself. While the method may change the principle involved, namely, that of unselfishness and caring for one another, is of perpetual obligation, and must find expression, habitually, in our Christian life if our Christianity is to bear any resemblance to that which Christ taught and exemplified.

The observance of any caste lines, or any lines between the rich and the poor, as limitations to our friendship and brotherly love, is utterly opposed to the spirit of Christ. The extract from James, cited above, sets forth the principle very clearly that we are not to "hold the faith of our Lord J. sus Christ, the Lord of glory, with a respect of persons," but that we are to treat all alike, because of our common relationship to our common Father and common Savior. To despise the poor or mistreat them in any way, we are told, is a violation of the royal law: "Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself." How common it is for professed Christians to violate this law we need not say. Nothing is more certain, however, than that all who do it offend Jesus Christ and will be held to strict account for the

But not only must the rich be friendly to the poor, but the poor are equally bound to be friendly to the rich. The law of reciprocity holds good here. In the kingdom of God there is to be no rich nor poor, high nor low, bond nor free, male nor female, but all are to stand upon a common level before God and treat each other as equals—equal in their rights and privileges as citizens of the kingdom of God, equal in their essential rank as children of God and heirs of a common salvation.

We are reminded by the quotation from the Roman letter that this debt of obligation to each other can only be discharged by love: "For he that loveth his neighbor hath fulfilled the law." If only we have love for our fellowmen we shall co them no harm, for "love worketh no ill to his neighbor." The whole secret, then, of living the Christian life and of treating our fellowmen in the spirit of friendliness is to love men. It ought not to be difficult for us to love men when we remember that Christ loved them so well as to give Himself for them. Cardinal Manning on e said to Henry George: "I love men because Jesus loved them." Mr. George replied: "And I love Jesus because he loved men." No matter by which one of these processes we reach the end, if only we learn to love men as Christ loved them. Most men, however, we take it, come to love men through the love of Christ. We instinctively feel that if Christ loved men there is every reason why we should love them, and that by so much as we fail to do it we have fallen short of the standard set for us in his life.

We miss much of the sweetest joy of life in failing to manifest the spirit of friendliness to our fellowmen. Every one who has any experience in this matter will gladly testify to the joy that has been brought into hi own life by helping some one else; by giving the hand of friendship to one in need of a friend; by speaking the word of encour gement to the discouraged; by giving a little timely lift to one that is down and struggling to get upon his feet. These are the acts that make us feel most akin to God. and that clothe our lives with the greatest dignity and value. When we shall have reached the end of life's journey, if we shall have the opportunity of looking back over our lives and recounting the deeds we have done, nothing will give us so great pleasure nor so much assurance that we are Christ's, and that He is our friend, as the remembrance of these acts of disinterested kindness and friendship along the way, by which we have lightened the burden of some weary fellowtraveler, helped up the fallen, guided the erring, checked the tears of sorrow and brought cheer and gladness into sad and desolate hearts and homes.

What a genius Jesus had for finding people who were in distress and ministering to them! What a heart of compassion He possesses for all our human sorrow! How ready were His hands to minister to human need! How full was His busy life of these acts of friendship by which He has proved Himself to be the friend of humanity! How can we be Christians without cultivating His spirit and imitating His example?

PRAYER.

O, God, our Father, we thank Thee that Thou hast manifested Thy friendship for our race in so many ways, but especially in that Thou hast given us our best friend, Jesus Christ our Savior. We thank Thee for the depth and sincerity of His friendship, who loved us and gave Himself for us. Grant, we beseech Thee, that His love for us may inspire within us, not only a responsive love for Him, but a love for all whom He loved, and a friendship for all whom He befriended. Enable us to be more helpful to each other, and grant that friendliness to all may become a habit of our lives until we, like our Master, may go about doing good. And this we ask in His precious name. Amen!

Editor's Easy Chair Or MACATAWA MUSINGS.

Toward the close of each season the gregarious instinct of the Disciples here at the Park asserts itself in the form of a picnic. No one present is responsible for it, nobody invites anybody else. It is simply noised about that on such a day a little steamer, chartered for the purpose, will take those who wish to g up Black Lake to Point Superior for the annual picnic. Those who desire to go-and generally all do desire who hear of it-join the number at the stated time, and it always assumes good proportions. This year the party numbered upwards of sixty. The small steamer, Harvey Watson, left the Macatawa dock at tenthirty Wednesday morning of this week bearing the women and children, and a portion of the men, the other portion having gone up the lake earlier in the morning in their rowboats to secure the fish for the fish fry, which is generally one of the features of the occasion. As usual, we had a lovely day. The weather was all that could have been asked. It is always an interesting spectacle when the little steamer runs as near the shore as it can, at the point of land extending out into the lake, and is unloaded by rowboats that ply back and forth, carrying passengers and the bountiful supply of provision. All this reminds us of the landing of the pilgrim fathers and mothers, minus "the stern and rock-bound coast." Once on the ground, under the shade of the spreading oaks, an animated picture is soon presented. Some of the men are carrying water from a neighboring well, others are carrying wood to cook the midday meal, some of the women are busy superintending the cooking, others in preparing the table, while others still are gathered in groups, busily engaged with their fancy work, and getting acquainted with each other. Dinner was served at one o'clock, and supper at five-thirty, giving us two meals in the woods, and the interim for social intercourse and mutual acquaintanceship. Some of the amateur artists secured a number of interesting pictures as the party were grouped around the long table on the grass, or especially grouped for the purpose of a picture. Our steamer returned at seven o'clock, by which time all were prepared to go on board. The rowboats are fastened together so as to be towed by the steamer and the return voyage is made in the magic hour between sunset and darkness. Many a sweet old song, in which all joined heartily, floated out over the lake on the calm and listening ear of evening. Many of us thought of Bro. Atkinson, who was with us a year ago, and whose heart was too full for utterance as he listened to the sweet old songs, on which his soul had so often been carried heavenward. It was an occasion so pleasant, so full of friendly intercourse and goodly fellowship as to plant itself in the memory, and all voted it one of the crowning features of the season.

More and more each year Macatawa Park is becoming the summer home of a large number of Disciples of Christ from Illinois, Indiana, Kentucky, Missouri and Michigan, with scattering representatives from a number of other states. If the summer outing has become a necessity, or at least a desirable feature of our modern life, then it seems to be well that such vacation be taken under such conditions as will not hinder but rather foster the religious life. This can hardly be, however, without the association together of a number of people, sufficiently kindred in their religious thought and modes of worship as to enable them to carry on religious services profitably. These conditions are present at Macatawa Park. Besides the large number of those associated with our Reformation who come here, there are other religious people of kindred spirit who make this their summer home, and who readily affiliate with us in holding religious services, and in maintaining the moral life of the place. Not only, therefore, does Macatawa Park accomplish its original purpose of furnishing the rest and recuperation for those who come here, but it is more and more each year becoming a center of religious influences which, we do not doubt, do more for the extension of Christ's kingdom and for the promotion of Christian unity than could possibly be accomplished by the same people living and worshiping in their accustomed places.' This makes a double justification for such a summer resort as Macatawa Park has become. The most satisfactory method of living here, however, for most people, as we have stated before, is the cottage life, and those who are planning to make this their summer home and who do not like hotel life should either build a cottage or arrange early to rent one that will answer the purpose. We have no financial interest whatever in the place except our own cottage, and all that we have said concerning it is for the benefit of our readers who may desire to avail themselves of the advantage which this place offers for a profitable summer outing.

The present season here is drawing to a close. It has been the most prosperous season in the history of the Park. It has been one of the warmest, too, though, of course, it has been comfortable in comparison with the cities and inland towns. But the backbone of the summer heat is broken. Even as we write this paragraph the clouds are pouring down a copious rain over lake and woods. It is one of those rainy days in which it is a delight to stay indoors and listen to the patter of the rain on the roof, and hear its musical plashing from the eaves, and its dripping from the leaves of the trees. The woods are still as green as they were in June, so frequent and copious have been the rains during the summer. But the air is cooler, and soon the touch of frost will turn these green leaves to scarlet and gold. Each steamer that leaves now is laden with those returning home, and in a little while the stirring, busy, bustling place will have the hush and quiet of a deserted village, The services on last Lord's day, however. were largely attended, and the sermon by Rev. Dr. Wilson, of DeKalb, Ill., was one of the best of the season. The beach service in the evening was also one of the largest and best we have had during the entire season. It was led by T. P. Haley, of Kansas City, who, as our readers know, is a "master of assemblies," and the speeches were all of a high order. People sat in the sand and sang the old familiar hymns, one after another, for nearly half an hour before the time for the formal beginning of the services. What a power there is in those old songs, that are so freighted with the precious memories of the past, to lift the soul nearer to God, and fill it with high and heavenly aspirations! Would it not be an improvement on many of our church services if we could have more singing and less preaching, or at least shorter sermons? And why would it not be a good thing to have a number of short addresses, at one of the church services, instead of the stated sermon? This is the character of our beach services, and it is the most popular meeting we have here.

We have read a number of books during the present summer, all of which we have found more or less helpful. The last two we have read present a very strong contrast in the dominating spirit which actuated their authors. These two books are "The Reign of Law: A Tale of the Kentucky Hemp Fields," by James Lane Allen, and "Black Rock: A Tale of the Selkirks," by Ralph Connor. We did not find "The Reign of Law" very satisfying. Mr. Allen is a literary artist, fine phrase-maker, a descriptive writer of fine ability-though perhaps description is a little overdone in the present work-and has gained a wide popularity by his literary work. His hero, "David," reminds one of "Robert Elsmere," whose faith seems to have been unaccountably overturned by statements of the "Squire," which he ought to have been able to answer. "David" reads Darwin on the "Descent of Man," "Origin of the Species" and other scientific works on evolution, and straightway loses his faith in God, in Christ and in divine revelation! It is all right for an author who wishes to set forth such a character to do so, but the motive for it is difficult to understand, unless it is followed by a more perfect teaching and a profounder thought, which would disclose to him the difference between secondary causes and the great primary Cause. Romanes went into skepticism for failing to make this simple distinction, and when he "came to himself," later in life, he wrote a reply to his former skeptical work, pointing out where his mistake was, and indicating that he had mistaken secondary causes for the primary cause. This seems to have been "David's" mistake. He tells "Gabriella" with a great show of frankness that it is law that does everything. Whereas, even "Gabriella," if she was fit to be a schoolteacher, ought to be able to tell him that law does nothing, that it is only a way of doing things; that evolution, even if proved to be true, is only God's way of bringing about that which exists. But the book ends with "David" an agnostic, and with no intination that he had recovered from his unnecessary skepticism. Ralph Connor's "Black Rock" is the opposite of all this. He is equally a literary artist, but exhibits a deeper insight into human nature, and into the nature of religion. His work shows in a masterly way the power of the simple gospel, incarnated in a life like that of Preacher Craig, pastor at "Black Rock," a mining camp, to transform the lives of the worst type of men-drunkards and gamblers -and to lift them into lives of purity and of Christian service. In dramatic interest, in the power to touch the human heart and to quicken the conscience, "Black Rock" is in every way superior to "The Reign of Law."

Questions and Hnswers.

In baptizing persons is it necessary for one to use the formula: "I baptize you into the name of the Father, of the Son, and of the Holy Spirit?" If so, why is it? Is it not what we do rather than what we say that constitutes valid baptism?

E. T. Steuart.

We should say it was necessary to use the formula substantially as given above. The reason is that in the great commission we are commanded so to baptize. The formula is as much authorized by the command as the act. What is said is a part of what is done. Suppose the administor should say, "I baptize you into the name of Mahomet:" Would that make any difference? The elements of baptism, supposing the candidate to be properly prepared, are the formula, the element and the action.

Is the last clause in the Lord's Prayer an interpolation? "For thine is the kingdom, and the power, and the glory, forever. Amen!" (Matt. 6:13.)

This phrase is omitted from the most ancient and authentic manuscripts, but many authorities, and some of them ancient, contain the phrase. It is omitted from the Revised New Testament, which is proof that it is not regarded as belonging to the most ancient and authentic manuscripts. It is doubtless, however, of very ancient origin, and there is certainly nothing in it out of harmony with the spirit of the prayer.

A certain minister recently told me that the book Josephus came within four votes of being in the Bible. Is this statement correct? If so, what definite assurance have we that we are using the Word of God correctly?

Indianapolis, Ind. L. A. M.

The statement is wholly incorrect. In the first place, it assumes what is not true—that the books in the Bible were placed there by a vote of some body of men which had authority to decide. This is not the case. The canonicity of the various books of the Bible is decided by historical proofs of their origin and by internal testimony, and these proofs are subjected to the scrutiny and investigation of the scholars of all ages. It is the consensus of biblical scholarship of the wor'd that gives any book its place in the Bible.

In a recent answer to a question of mine you say regarding baptism: "There is no virtue in it apart from the fact that it is an expression of the believer's faith." Here you and I differ. If a man makes a confession of Christ as his Savior and ignores the ordinance of baptism, what will be his condition? And why, then, are we to be judged according to the deeds done in the body?

A. D.

We are sorry that our brother differs from the statement that baptism is an act of faith, and apart from faith has no virtue or value. We think this indicates a need on his part of a re-study of the relation of faith and obedience in the New Testament. The man who "ignores" baptism, or any other command given by our Savior, shows that he has no faith, provided he has any knowledge of the existence of the command. A genuine faith in Christ prompts a willing and cheerful obedience to every command which he makes, and the man who despises any of these commandments will be rejected for his unbelief.

- 1. May we not consider the seventy whom Christ sent out (Luke 10) as apostles?
- 2. If so, what was the specific difference between the commission of the twelve and that of the seventy?
- 3. Can we consider Paul as an apostle in the same sense as the twelve apostles?
- 4. What do you consider to be the chief characteristics of an apostle?
- 5. What is the difference between an apostle and a disciple?
 - H. B. Boone, Superintendent.
- 1. The term apostle means one sent, and in this sense the seventy were apostles, though not designated as such in the New Testament.
- 2. The commission of the seventy was limited to the Jewish people—"the lost tribes of the house of Israel." That of the twelve was to "all the world" and to "every creature." Moreover, the seventy were to preach repentance and announce the near advent of the kingdom. The twelve were to preach the full gospel of the Christ, who had come, who had died for our sins, who had been buried, who had risen again for our justification and who had been coronated as King and were authorized to make known the terms of salvation under His reign.
- 3. Yes, he was as really an apostle as the others, though his mission lay especially among the Gentiles.
- 4. They were witnesses of Christ, and especially of his resurrection from the dead.

and they were qualified by a special endowment of the Spirit to make known Christ's will to the world.

5. An apostle is a disciple who has been chosen for the special work of an apostle and qualified for that special work.

Do you believe it is right to use force for the extension of the kingdom in China, or that stronger nations, like the United States and Great Britain, should compel weaker nations to accept their civilization and religion?

C. L. R.

Certainly not. Jesus said: "My kingdom is not of this world." If it were my servants would fight for it. It is utterly repugnant to the whole spirit and teaching of Christ to compel people to accept Christianity at the mouth of the cannon. No Christian believes any such thing. American people do not believe that the commission which Christ gave to his disciples, "Go into all the world and preach the gospel to every creature," has a "Gatling gun attachment." It is another matter, however, for this government to protect the lives and property of its citizens in China. This it is compelled to do by the very law under which nations exist, even if it must use force to accomplish the end. War is a rude form of justice that must be resorted to when a nation or people is not amenable to any other form of justice. Government is ordained of God for the punishment of evildoers. God has always used one nation to punish another for its national sins. Our soldiers and Gatling guns are not in China, or in the Philippines, or anywhere else to compel people to accept Christianity, or to acknowledge Jesus Christ as Lord. They are there to protect life and property, to establish law and order and to administer justice. Chinamen may continue to worship their ancestors until the end of the world without molestation from the United States if they respect the laws of nations and protect the presence and property of our citizens residing there. But neither China nor any other nation can expect to escape the scourge of war if it violate the recognized principles of international obligations and treaty rights. It is true, these armies that are invading China for the protection of life and for the restoration of order may open the way for a freer proclamation of the gospel by the missionaries of the cross. This, however, is incidental and is not the purpose for which the armies are there. It is a strange objection to the church that it should be willing to avail itself of these open doors for the extension of the reign of Christ—a King who reigns in righteousness, and whose government secures justice and liberty for all. It is the duty of the stronger nations to help the weaker and not to covet their possessions, nor infringe upon their rights. We believe the men who are in authority in both the United States and Great Britain recognize this truth and are seeking, to the best of their ability, to discharge their national obligations, though they doubtless often make mistakes, for they are not infallible.

IS CONVERSION A HUMAN OR DIVINE ACT?

W. T. MOORE.

That conversion in some sense is taught in the Bible no one will dispute. But in what sense? Just here we meet with the difficulty. Whatever may be the nice distinctions of theologians with respect to the matter it is certain that the common people very generally have no very definite and clear idea as to what conversion really is. For the most part they hold to the notion that conversion is wholly a divine a t and that the subject is entirely passive instead of being s mething that the man must do for himself. Consequently, many persons wait for this divine interposition without attempting to do anything for themselves in the matter

It is well known that this false view of conversion has produced untold evil. It is interesting to trace the origin of this false view. The original never occurs passively. This is a most important fact, and if the original had been strictly followed doubtless the people would never have been so far misled as to adopt the view they have. The perverted form-"be converted"-is first found in the venerable blunder of Jerome's Vulgate. His version reads: "Poenitemini igitur et convertimini." A literal translation is: "Be ye penitent and be converted." The first translation by Wicliffe followed very closely Jerome's Latin instead of the Greek. Unfortunately King James' translators did the same thing. In many particulars they slavisbly followed Jerome instead of the original Greek. As regards the matter under consideration, they may have been influenced by Wicliffe and other translators. But, however this may have been, the Authorized Version is largely responsible for the widespread confusion and error on the subject of conversion.

It will doubtless be instructive to the reader to have before him just what the most important versions say with regard to Acts 3:19. The following is a complete list:

Wicliffe, 14th century: "Therefore be ye repentaunt and be ye convertid, that youre synnes be done awaye, whanne the tymes of kelynge fro the siyt of the Lord shulen come."

Tyndale, 16th century: "Repent ye, therefore, and turne, that youre synnes may be done awaye," etc.

Coverdale (Henry 8th), 16th century: "Do enaunce, therefore and turne ye that youre synnes may be done awaye."

Bishop's Bible, 1568: "Repent ye, therefore, a d convert, that your sinnes may be done awaye," etc.

Cranmer' Bible, or Great Bible, 1540: "Let it repent you, therefore, and converte that your synnes maye be done awaye."

Geneva Bible, or Breeches Bible, 1560: "Amend your lives, therefore, and turne that your sinnes may be put away."

Rheims Bible (Roman Catholic), 1582: 'Be penitent, therefore, and convert, that your sinnes may be put out."

Douay Bible (Roman Catholic), 1620: "Be penitent, therefore, and be converted."

Luther's German Bible, 16th century: "Repent and turn yourselves."

I omit the Revised Version because that is within the reach of all my readers. However, it may be well to say that when the active voice is restored the difference in the truth presented is so great that the version practically gives to the people what is actually a new revelation. The difference between "be converted" and "convert" or "turn" is the difference between the poles. In short, it is exactly the difference between the Calvinism of the old schools and the rational view of the better theology of the present day. The latter view assumes that conversion is something that the man does for himself, instead of something done for him or in him by divine power, and this is precisely what the original word really im-

Of course, it is understood that even in conversion there is the divine side to be considered. God supplies the motives, but he does not act for us. The gospel is the power of God unto salvation, and consequently there can be no turning to God without the motive which the gospel supplies. But this is a very different thing from the notion that the subject in conversion is wholly passive.

I am not unfamiliar with the distinction which some make between conversion and regeneration. In their view of the matter the latter stands for the divine side while the former stands for the human. But even if this distinction could be justified it is still true that the popular mind regards conversion as comprehending all that is involved in the sinner's return to God. Indeed, very many modern evangelists do their work in such a way as to lead to the conclusion that they regard the subject in conversion as entirely passive. This misleading notion has almost unlimited currency among the sects of modern Christendom.

Any one who will attend the average protracted meeting will soon see signs of the fatal error to which attention is called.

The question which I am discussing is fundamental. It lies at the very basis of present-day theological controversies. It is practically the dividing line between the old theology and the new. But the false view of conversion we are considering has a practical import which cannot be estimated. It is from this practical point of view that its influence is to be dreaded. Indeed, it is difficult to measure the amount of damage already done by this vicious theological figment. No doubt tens of thousands of honest souls have been stopped on their way to the kingdom of God by the notion that they can do nothing for themselves in the matter of becoming Christian. And yet, nothing can be clearer than the teaching of the Scriptures on this subject when they are legitimately translated. They certainly teach that conversion is an act, that this act is performed by the subject, and that this act of the subject is turning about. To sum up the whole matter it is sufficient to say that the sinner is going in the wrong direction, and his conversion implies a complete turning about, so that he may go in exactly the opposite direction. This must be his own act, and it must also be of his own free will. And this is clearly indicated in the Greek word epistrepho.

The continued prevalence of the error under consideration is very suggestive from another point of view. It shows how tenaciously error holds its place when once firmly established. It really seems almost impossible to shake the Christian world from a long-settled habit. The best biblical criticism has made it absolutely certain that conversion is a human, not a divine act; and yet, the false preaching and the false practice still go on as if nothing at all had happened. This is most disheartening. Nevertheless, as it is exactly in the line of the usual we ought not perhaps to expect anvthing else. It is hard to change a longestablished habit.

One thing, however, is very certain, viz., if the world is ever converted to Christ we must in some way return to the teaching and practice of the apostles on the subject of conversion. When we do this we shall hear no more about "getting religion," "the mourner's bench," etc., but the people will hear, believe and obey the same day and the same hour of night, as they did in apostolic times.

BIRTHDAY OF THE CHURCH.

D. H. BAYS.

The average reader will no doubt agree with Bro. Kimball (CHRITIAN-EVANGELIST June 21, p. 775) that Bro. Garrrison's reply to my communication of June 7 "is a perfect squelcher and complete confutation of the position assume ;" and Bro. K. seems to think that Bro. B. himself will concede" as much. But permit me to whisper into Bro. K.'s ear that we by no means share in his view of the "squelching" qualities of the rejoinder in question. While I feel very grateful to Bro Garrison for his painstaking effort to enlighten me upon this somewhat perplexed question, yet I am quite sure he will pardon me if I find myself obliged to take a different view from that expressed in his rejoinder.

I wish to briefly examine the Scriptures cited in order to see if they prove what they are designed to establish. The point to be proved, it will be born in mind, is that "the church was born [had its beginning] on the Pentecost following Christ's resurrection." If the passages quoted prove that the church began to exist on the day in question, well and good; but if the "beginnings" mentioned refer to something else, as I believe they do, then the affirmative fails.

In the production of evidence we must be governed by that universal rule of law which provides that the testimony of a witness must not only be material to the issue, but that it must relate to the matters and things set up in the petition or charged in the indictment. In the case now under consideration the allegation is made that the church was born, or had its beginning, on Pentecost. The plaintiff must not only prove something began on the day in question, but he must prove that that something was the church. Does either of Bro. Garrison's witnesses affirm that the church was born on Pentecost? We shall see.

His first witness says:

(a) "Upon this rock I will build my church." From these words as a basis the argument is made that "the building of the church was a future event." This we readily grant, but does that mean that the church did not then exist, and that the "future event" was to bring it into existence? We think not. I understand the term "I will build' to refer to the establishment of the church, and not to its origin or "beginning." The correctness of Bro. Garrison's position depends upon the correctness of th sense in which he employs the term "will build," To sustain his view the word "build" must mean to originate. In that case the passage should read:

"Upon this rock I will originate my church." How do you like the rendering? But suppose we examine into the meaning of the world build. Literally it means:

"1. To erect an edifice on the ground by uniting various materials into a regular structure; 2. To construct or frame a fabric of any kind." Figuratively, it means:

"1. To construct, frame or form; 2. 10 raise or bring into existence anything on any ground or foundation; 3. To compose, put together."—Am. Ency. Dict.

The argument is made that, grounded upon "the rock-truth confessed by Peter," Christ would originate or "bring into existence" his church.

In order thus to build a church, it must be "constructed" (def. 1), "raised" (def. 2), or "composed" (def. 3). If the church was "brought into existence" on Pentecost, as claimed, will some one tell us of what it was "composed," and how it was "constructed?" Crabb says that "what is constructed is put together with ingenuity." Query: Was the church constructed or "put together with ingenuity" on Pentecost? Who will dare to affirm that it was so constructed, with the faintest hope that the Bible will sustain him?

From habit, more than from Scripture or reason, it is affirmed that the church was organized on Pentecost. Is this claim tenable? Was the church "organized" on Pentecost? Let us see.

"Organize—to form or furnish with suitable or necessary organs."

Who cares to undertake the herculean task of proving (not asserting) that the church was "furnished with necessary organs" on Pentecost? Who will undertake to inform us as to what these "necessary organs" were? If organs were furnished to the church on Pentecost—if somebody proves this, then he will have proved that the church existed before Pentecost, for how could organs, necessary or otherwise, have been given to something that did not exist?

Thus it is rendered clear almost beyond doubt that the word "build" in Matt. 16:18, which has by so many been forced into service to prove that the church was "organized" on Pentecost cannot be used as synonymous with organize, and hence the passage does not prove what it is quoted to sustain. That Jesus meant to assure his disciples of the permanency and stability of his church rather than to create the impression that he was going to originate something that did not exist is apparent from his words: "The gates of hell shall not prevail against it." The world "build" has another meaning which is in perfect harmony with this idea, namely, "4. To strengthen, to establish." Reading this definition into the passage we have: "Upon this rock I will establish my church"—exactly the thing of which Jesus wished to assure them.

To establish is "to make firm; to make sure; to ordain permanently and with authority." This passage, then (Matt. 16:18), instead of proving that "the church was born on Pentecost," only proves that the church, then existing, should, like the foundation on which it rested, be established—"made sure," and abide forever. This and nothing more.

(b) After quoting the great commission (Matt. 28:19; Mark 16:15, 16) Bro. Garrison remarks:

"Surely, the church of Christ could not begin until after repentance and the remission of sins were preached in his name."

The following was quoted to sustain this view: "And He said unto them, Thus it is written, that the Christ should suffer and rise again from the dead the third day, and that repentance and remission of sins should be preached in his name unto all the nations, beginning from Jerusalem" (Luke 24:46,47). But unfortunately for this p sition the church is not once mentioned, much less to declare that it was born on Pentecost after Peter's great sermon.

Clearly, this passage refers, not to the beginning of the church, but to the beginning of the public ministry of the apostles, as Bro. Garrison himself admits in the following enquiry: "When were they to begin this work of preaching the gospel and baptizing believers into the name of the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit?" .(The italics are mine.)

Bro. Garrison himself, then, being the witness, the "beginning" referred to is the beginning of the public ministry of the apostles, and not the beginning of an organic structure known as the hurch.

After commissioning his apostles to "go into all the world and preach the gospel to every creature" he commanded them to "tarry in the city of Jerusalem" till they should receive the promise of the Father (Luke 24:49). They were to tarry at Jerusalem, not till the church should be organized, but for a far more important event, namely, till they should be "endowed with power from on high," for without this endowment they never could have carried out the divine command to preach the gospel to every creature.

Atter quoting Luke 23:46, 47 Bro. Garrison continues:

"We have now the beginning place. Can we find the beginning time?"

(c) Correctly enough the "beginning place" is located at Jerusalem, and the "beginning time" at Pentecost, but the "beginning" of what! The church? That is what our brother started out to prove, but I hardly need to remind the careful reader that the chur h is not once mentioned. The place and time referred to in the texts quoted mark the "beginning" of the public gospel ministry of the apostles in the name of their divine Master, as any one may see, and not the beginning of the church.

(d) In the fourth paragraph of the article under review we have the following:

"If there was a church of Christ before this time [Pentecost] it was established without the preaching of repentance and remission of sins in the name of Christ, without baptism in the name of Christ and without the Holy Spirit."

Here it is assumed that the ministry both of Jesus and John was a ministry in which the Holy Spirit had no part— a formal if not a barren ministry of the letter and not of the Spirit. If either Jesus or John or both were "led by the Spirit," then their ministry was in the Spirit. If they were led by the Spirit to minister in spiritual things, then Bro. Garrison's remarkable claim that the church, if it existed before Pentecost, "was established without the Holy Spirit" is utterly without foundation in fact.

Of John it was prophetically declared: "He shall be filled with the Holy Spirit, even from his mother's womb, and many of the children of Israel shall he turn to the Lord their God" (Luke 1:16,17).

Peter called Jesus "both Lord and Christ" (Acts 2:36). John, therefore, being "filled with the Holy Spirit," was to turn many of the Jews to Christ. It is quite probable, therefore, that John ministered in the name of Christ. Of Christ Matthew writes:

"And Jesus, when he was baptized, went up straightway out of the water; and lo, the heavens were opened unto Him, and He saw the Spirit of God descending like a dove, and lighting upon Him; and lo, a voice from heaven, saying, This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased" (Matt. 3:16, 17).

"And Jesus, being full of the Holy Spirit, returned from the Jordan and was led by the Spirit into the wilderness" (Luke 4:1). And yet, in the face of these facts we are told that "if there were a church of Christ before Pentecost" it was established "without the Holy Spirit!"

(e) The further objection is urged that if there was a church of Christ before Pentecost "it was established without the preaching of repentance and remission of sins in the name of Christ, and without baptism in the name of Christ." This may be true, but the fact does not appear. The premise is assumed, not proved. But suppose some other name than that of Christ were used in the baptismal formula-which is doubtful-and suppose "repentance and remission of sins" were preached in some other name, which is equally doubtful: does that prove or even tend to prove that "the church was born on the Pentecost following Christ's resurrection?" To me the logic seems faulty-the premise does not justify the conclusion.

(f) The fact that the name of the trinity may not have been employed either by Christ or John in the batismal formula by no means proves that repentance and remission of sins were not preached in the name of Christ; neither does it prove that the church was organized on the day of Pentecost. The church may have existed before Pentecost in spite of the fact that preaching and baptism may not have been done in the name of Christ.

(CONCLUDED NEXT WEEK.)

A MAN OF MARK.

L. H. STINE.

A prince and a great man is fallen in Israel. B. H. Smith, the tireless and fearless combatant in life's deepening struggle, has fought his last battle and won his crowning victory. The sacred burden that he loved and solemnly bore, and beneath which he steadfastly walked for many a year, he has laid down in exchange for the rest that is sweet after strife. Now that his long day's work is done, he folds his hands across his breast and turns to the quietness that God gives at last.

B. H. Smith was born in Richmond, Virginia, March 1, 1828. His father, Wm. N., was a native of Virginia and his mother was born in South Carolina. Wm. N. Smith moved to Missouri in 1838 and settled in Howard County, where for many years he followed contracting and architectural work.

B. H. Smith located in Trenton, Missouri, when he was about seventeen years of age. He had a fair education, with some knowledge of Latin. He became deputy clerk of Grundy County, and he studied and practiced the profession of law for six years.

In 1854 Bro. Smith became a member of the Christian Church, whose growing interests were supreme in his affections for forty-six years.

With the discovery of Christ came the responsibility of answering the higher claims. From the law to the gospel was a gradational passage that gave a powerful advocate to the doctrine of grace.

Having found his work he sought to qualify himself for the high obligation. Without delay he sat down at the feet of Alexander Campbell and took his academic degree from Bethany College.

In 1859 Bro. Smith accepted the presidency of the Female College at Bloomington, Illinois, where he taught for one year. Christian University, Canton, Mo., was the next school that offered him its presidency, and he held that position for ten years, and the university attained its highest degree of prosperity under his vigorous leadership. In this position Bro. Smith was a maker of preachers, and the indirect influence of his labors was felt far and wide. In 1875 he accepted the presidency of Hesperian College at Woodland, California, where after three years' service he ended his career of fourteen consecutive years as a teacher.

On leaving the school at Bloomington, Bro. Smith assumed the pastoral care of the church at Brunswick, Mo. After serving the church one year he became pastor of the First Church in St. Louis. After four years he went to Chicago. From Oakland, California, where he preached for the church, he returned to Canton, Mo., and became president of the Bank of Canton. In Canton he spent the remaining years of his life, preaching a part of the time for the Canton church. Here, among lifelong friends, he died July the eleventh, at six o'clock in the morning.

During the last five years of his life Bro. Smith was an invalid, but cheerful and hopeful and always appreciative of the numerous attentions of his many friends. These were years of constant reading and of deep meditation. Bro. Hardin evidently gave a correct statement of Bro. Smith's experience during these years, when he said in his funeral address that during these five years our deceased brother wrought out of his own soul a larger spiritual interpretation of the Christian religion than he had ever enjoyed before.

B H. Smith was a great preacher. His commanding presence gained for him at once the favorble attention of people. He had a magnificent body. A massive head crowned his stately physique. His brow was large and his eyes were bright, with a far-away look, like an eye of hope peering into the distance. Lines marking the presence of the energetic and heroic virtues were deeply drawn in his striking face, indicating him to he a man of great moral courage and invincible faith, of indomitable will and triumphant hope. Endowed with such rugged virtues, enriched with the gift of an eloquent tongue, and his mind illumed with the light of a liberal education, B. H. Smith was a preacher that needed not to be ashamed, and of whom the people were proud. Possessed of that intellectual penetrat on that enabled him to see clearly the truth in his own mind, and having both the language and the enthusiasm that enchanted the ear, he carried conviction to the hearts of his hearers.

The spirit of evangelism pervaded his ministry. He baptized four thousand converts to the cross. This was a rich harvest of souls to be gathered in by a man busy with the cares of a teacher, a pastor and a man of business. How broad must have been his mind, how deep his soul, how intense the desires of his heart, how noble his spirit and how confident his prayers that he should have crowned his life with an inheritance of such golden fruit!

The law of spiritual growth was in full force in the life of B. H. Smith. remarked, his life was the embodiment of the sterner virtues, which were more conspicuous during the active period of his life. During his last years, however, the milder virtues pushed their way into great prominence. It was Paul, the man of action, who announced the law of development that found so fine an example of fulfillment in the life of Bro. Smith. Paul's law of progress is stated in these words: "Howbeit, that is not first which is spiritual, but that which is natural; then that which is spiritual." The growth of Bro. Smith was from the stronger and more rigorous virtues to the milder and gentler ones. Simon Peter represents love as the last round in the ladder of life. the final attainment of the soul, and the virtue nearest the portal of heaven. Before death claimed him him Bro. Smith had reached the round so much to be desired. In the active period of his life he was busy as ever Martha was; in the closing years of his life he became meditative and receptive as ever Mary was at Jesus' feet. He was bold in action as Paul and Luther, then h became mild as John the "Apostle of Love," and gentle and irenic as Melanchthon. If Bro. Smith loved the sound of battle that brought on and had found delight in "the toil of war" that was waged to right all wrongs and to put truth on the throne he also experienced the sweetness and the calm of the love of God.

Bro. Smith's journey never bated until the eventide. He went to sleep at a ripe old age. J. H. Hardin, whose office of love it was to deliver a message of synpathy, spoke appropriate words at the funeral service from that piece of beautiful imagery in the first chapter of Job: "Thou shalt come to thy grave in full age, like as a shock of corn cometh in its season." The words of the speaker were timely and were fitly spoken. In a full age our venerable brother came to the grave and a crown of glory was on his life.

Quincy, Ill.

THE GLADSTONE-HUXLEY CONTROVERSY.

DEAN HAGGARD, OF DRAKE UNIVERSITY.

"So goodly a fight," said Henry Drummond at the time, "has not been seen for many a day."

Who were the antagonists of "the grand old man?" First was Dr. Reville, a professor in the College of France. Then Thomas Huxley, the well-known scientist. And last, Henry Drummond, of world-wide fame.

This "goodly fight" took place in the years 1885 and 1886. The attack upon Mr. Gladstone will be found in the book written by Prof. Reville. And the remainder of the battle may be read in the Nineteenth Century magazine, beginning in the November number of 1885 and ending in the August number of the next year.

It awakened a wide-spread interest at the time, and is yet vividly remembered by many. You can hardly find one who was then a reader that cannot recall the outlines of the debate. The recent publication of the life and labors of Henry Drummond has once more aroused interest in the greatest religious debate of this quarter of the present century. I hope it may not prove unprofitable to study some phases of the discussion.

OUTLINE SKETCH.

Dr. Reville was a staunch disciple of that school of philosophy which rules out the thought of a primitive revelation as inadmissible. As a strictly scientific thinker he starts out with the assumption that all religions have a subjective origin and a development which is fully accounted for by natural causes. He considers this assumption as beyond doubt. Since neither Genesis nor the Bible leave room for such a position, it is not at all strange that the Professor attacked both, and with them Mr.

Gladstone, one of the most renowned believers in a primitive revelation presented in Genesis. Such a man could hardly write a book without doing one or both of these things. In answering the attack of the French professor Mr. Gladstone drew down upon himself the fire from the heavy guns of Prof. Huxley. After correcting some of the misconceptions of the French critic Mr. Gladstone undertook to build up an argument from Genesis and geology to prove that the writer of Genesis "was gifted with faculties passing all human experience, or else his knowledge was divine." In making this argument Mr. Gladstone quoted and indorsed the leading geologists of his day for the order in which life made its appearance upon the earth as follows: (1) Water population, (2) air population, (3) land population of animals, (4) land population consummated in man. Mr. Huxley denied that natural science taught this order. He affirmed that it did teach the order: (1) Water, (2) land, (3) air, (4) man. At this point Henry Drummond came upon the field and took sides with Mr. Huxley on the main points in issue. He speaks of "the triumph of Mr. Huxley." Counting Mr. Gladstone as a "reconciler," he says: "To theological science the whole underlying theory of the reconcilers is as exploded as Bathybius."

About eighteen months ago George Adam Smith put out his biography of Prof. Drummond. From it I quote his estimate of the merits of the dispute: "In answer Mr. Huxley had little difficulty in showing that Mr. Gladstone's second proposition was not merely inaccurate, but directly contradictory of facts known to every one who is acquainted with the elements of natural science, and arguing that therefore the third proposition collapses of itself. In other words, Mr. Gladstone based his plea for a revelation of truth from God upon the agreement which he asserted of the first chaper of Genesis with the discoveries of modern science. Mr. Huxley denied that argument and concluded that with it there disappeared all argument for a divine revelation. It was at this point that Mr. Drummond intervened with the assertion that the question which the two antagonists debated, that namely of the harmony between Genesis and modern science, was absolutely irrelevant to the problem that it is impossible to harmonize Genesis and science; on the other side he denied that the contest between them was fatal to the belief that Genesis contained a revelation of truth from God" (p. 256).

Mr. Huxley was no less confident of the complete overthrow of his opponent. I quote: "I can meet the statement with nothing but a direct negative. If he has ever opened a respectable modern manual of paleontology or geology I cannot understand him. Natural science has nothing to say in favor of the proposition that they succeed one another in the order given by Mr. Gladstone; but that on the contrary all the evidence we possess goes to prove that they did not. I am not here dealing with a question of speculation, but with a question of fact. As a matter of fact, then, the statement so confidently put forward turns out to be devoid of foundation and in direct contradiction of the evidence at present at our disposal. Mr. Gladstone has been utterly misled in supposing that his interpretation of Genesis receives any support from natural science. The facts as they are at present known not only refute Mr. Gladstone's interpretation of Genesis in detail, but are opposed to the central idea on which it appears to be based." You see that Mr. Gladstone is annihilated. Smith, Drummond and Huxley have covered his case up with adjectives. There are no strong words or phrases left unused. His case is forever settled. Let none dare to reopen it. The old man is buried with the seal of science upon the door of his tomb. Are the angels notified not to roll the rock away?

Before proceeding with the review let us listen to a few questions.

In annihilating the grand old man who is swept away with him? All the so-called "reconcilers." A host of men like Hugh Miller, Dana and Dawson! These are all wrong! "Utterly misled!" Their position "absolutely without foundation!" "Science has not one thing to say in their favor!" "All the evidence against them!" Worthy only of unqualified "direct negatives" and "direct contradictions!"

Did Mr. Gladstone feel that he was hopelessly defeated? Did he make unconditional surrender and subside into unanswering silence? A negative answer to these questions will not, of course, decide who is right and who is wrong, but it is a comment upon the infallibility of scientific dogmatism. While Henry Drummond felt that it was "really hard on Mr. Gladstone," the old parliamentarian did not. Which had the better reason, let the reader determine for himself.

Did the greatest American geologist of the times think that Mr. Gladstone was swept into eternal oblivion by this storm of monumental dogmatism? Let the sequel answer.

Did Prof. Drummond conduct his part of the discussion in harmony with his wholesale condemnation of Mr. Gladstone's position? Keep this in mind and answer for yourself in a later part of this discussion.

FUNDAMENTAL PRINCIPLES.*

A man can no more live apart from his fellowmen and prosper as he ought to prosper than he can live without food. Society is essential to his proper development. Men will organize into societies for social, civil, commercial, industrial, moral, religious and other purposes, and these organic collective bodies must be endowed with certain rights and possessions in order to the fulfillment of their respective missions. No society can exist without constitutional powers and possessions. There must, then, of necessity be a division of rights and possessions between men as individuals and men in collective organic bodies. There is no such thing as unlimited personal liberty. Every organic collective body essential to man's moral, material and spiritual welfare has rights and must be protected in them; especially is this true of civil governments. The matter, therefore, of distinguishing between that that rightfully belongs to the individual and that that rightfully belongs to an organic collective body becomes a matter of supremest importance; disregard for this distinction a matter of supremest danger. But, while this principle holds throughout all organic bodies, it is not our purpose to follow it beyond its application to civil governments in this discussion.

No civil government of any size can do business without constitutional rights and a working capital. It has its expenses and must meet them. And if the distinction between that that rightfully belongs to the public and that that rightfully belongs to the individual was always rightfully made and observed, no government would ever be without a working capital. Neither would labor ever be taxed to supply a treasury bankrupted by theft or by unwise legislation. And any civilization that does not regard and enforce this distinction between public and private rights is essentially unchristian and oppressive, and headed toward destruction.

All true reform measures must like wise recognize this distinction. The weakness of many reform movements is their narrowness; they are too exclusive. No public measure in conflict with essential private rights can succeed without injuring the individual. Upon the other hand, no private or corporate measure in conflict with public interests can succeed without injuring the public. These rights are equally sacred and must be equally conserved, or friction, wrongs, oppression, tyranny and injustice of every sort will appear.

The most casual observer cannot fail to see that a large per cent. of our industrial, social and civil troubles as a nation have had their origin in the confusion and abuse of public and private rights, and not until the distinction between these rights is more clearly defined and enforced will these difficulties disappear.

It is an undeniable fact that our public lands have been squandered, our cities plundered of their franchises and other public possessions turned into private channels for private use. Not a few of our millionaires and multi-millionaires have become such by the private possession or use of that which belonged to the city, the state or the nation, and just to the extent that these organic collective bodies have been deprived of their rightful possessions the burdens upon labor have been correspondingly increased.

It could not be otherwise. These institutions must meet their current expenses, or cease to exist; and when deprived of their natural resources they have been compelled to levy a tax upon labor.

The reforms most urgently needed at present, therefore, are, first, the restoration to our various civil governments of their respective rights and resources; and, second, the restoration of all civil governments to the people. The government control of a public utility amounts to nothing if that government is controlled by a corporation, political boss, ring or machine. One reform without the other would be useless. Governments must not only own and control all public utilities, but must themselves be owned and controlled by the people. Restore to gov-ernments their rightful possessions, and then restore to the people their rightful governments, and you will have the key to the solution of about all of the national evils of which we complain and under which we groan.

Our Budget.

- -Church Extension Day.
- -Are you ready for it next Sunday?
- -It should be kept in mind that one church may be an inspiration to another.
- -Let such an offering be rolled up next Sunday that the homeless churches all over the land will rejoice.
- —The $250 000 goal will be reached if the collection is general and generous next Sunday. We believe our preachers will prove faithful to Church Extension.
- —Let the churches take an interest in reaching their apportionments suggested by the Board of Church Extension. That is the surest way to reach the $250,000.
- —The convention meeting in Kansas City will be all the happier because we have put a quarter of a million in the Church Extension Fund. Remember, it is to be the Jubilee Aftermath for Church Extension in October at the National Convention. But we must have that $250,000.
- —The receipts for Foreign Missions from October 1st, 1899, to August 23rd, 1900, amount to $152,181.14, or a gain of $22,610,42.
- -W. K. Homan, editor of the Christian Courier, has tendered his resignation that he may re-enter the practice of law in Colorado City. A meeting of the stockholders of the Christlan Courier Company is called for August 31st, to elect a successor to Bro. Homan in the editorial chair.
- —The typographical errors which have occurred in our recent numbers have been too frequent to be comfortable, but so has the weather. At least we think the weather is to blame for it, but now that the hot spell is broken we hope these annoyances will disappear.
- —The first of a series of four articles on "The Gladstone-Huxley Controversy," by Dean Haggard, of Drake Bible College, Des Moines, Lowa, appears in this paper. Though the great actors in this controversy are dead, their words are yet of living interest and vital importance, and our readers will be under obligations to Bro. Haggard for his presentation and comments thereon.
- —For the School of Pastoral Helpers, to begin in Cincinnati, O., September 18, the prospects are brightening. In addition to teachers and lecturers already announced, Graham Taylor, of Chicago, has been engaged to deliver one or more lectures. Since but a limited number of students are to be received, there is room but for five or six more than have already been enrolled, hence it is necessary for all who desire to come to send testimonials at once. Address A. M. Harvuot, Cincinnati, O.
- -Readers of this paper are again reminded that if they desire to attend the Missouri State Convention of Christian Church at Moberly, Mo. (and many ought), they should, as soon as possible, let us know their decision. If the number of delegates justifies it the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST will provide a special coach for their accommodation. This coach will be attached to the Wabash train leaving St. Louis at 9:15 A. M., Monday, Sept. 17th, and arriving at Moberly at 1:25 P. M. The Wabash Railroad and the M. K. & T. R'y make the rate of one fare for the round trip. It will cost you nothing more to be a member of the CHRIS-TIAN-EVANGELIST special party. If you live in St. Louis or can come by way of St. Louis or can join our party at any point on the Wabash between St. Louis and Moberly, consider yourself cordially invited to join us. But do not fail to notify us soon in order that ample accommodations may be provided. Address W. D. Cree, in care of this office. For a list of all the roads giving half fare to the convention see Bro. Abbot's card in this paper.

- —In this paper is an interesting critical article by Dr. W. T. Moore, of Columbia, Mo., on conversion. While the theory criticised is in the passive state a parting glance at it will serve to sharpen our vision of the coming church of the new century. It will also help to show how poorly grounded were some of the bitter religious controversies of the passing century.
- —L. H. Stine, in this paper, writes beautifully and sweetly of the life of B. H. Smith, who died not many weeks ago at Canton, Mo. The tribute is worthy of both the writer and the subject. Its portrayal of the character and life of Bro. Smith is clear, comprehensive and inspiring, and will be read with great pleasure by his vast circle of admiring friends.
- —The program of the Iowa Christian Convention did not reach us until press day and cannot appear in this issue. The convention will be held in the University Place Church, Des Moines, Iowa, Sept. 3-7, and promises to be the best in the history of our work in Iowa. One of the best programs ever prepared awaits the convention. It is a program of pressing issues, inspiring names, thrilling subjects, important business, vital interests and worthy of an immense attendance. Let there be such an outpouring of the people as shall awaken the entire state to renewed life and energies and inspire other states to greater things for Christ.
- —Brethren, do not forget that the time of the Missouri State Convention is drawing near. It is to be held in Moberly, Sept. 17-20. The program which appears in this paper is one of the best yet presented and the railroads, most of them are kindly granting one fare for the round trip. See Bro. Abbott's card on that subject elsewhere in this paper. The coming convention at Moberly ought to mark a new era in our work in Missouri. It will be the last one for the century. A great history, a great cause, and great future possibilities ought to make this by far the greatest and Missouri.
- -On Tuesday evening of this week farewell services were held at the Mt. Cabanne Church for Bro. Dungan and his family, participated in by all of the activities of the church from the Junior Y. P. S. C. E. up to the official board, and also by the sister congregations of the city through their pastors. Many brethren from the other congregations were present and the occasion and exercises were impressive and expressive of the high place which Bro. Dungan and his family hold in their hearts. While pastor of Mt. Cabanne Church Bro. Dungan has filled various positions of honor and trust in other fields of labor in this city. He has been active in the Y. M. C. A. lectures, in temperance work, and for many months was teacher of the Sunday-school Union Bible Class of the city; or in other words, a teacher of the Sunday-school teachers of the city. He was also a member of St. Louis Alliance of Christians Ministers, and a pillar in our own association of ministers. His departure from the city will, therefore, be felt by a wide circle of friends in a large number of interests as well as by our own people and churches. Bro. Dungan is now president of Christian University, and though successful in his pastoral work in St. Louis, he will be glad to get back into the schoolroom again, which place is his chief delight. There are few men who seem to take greater pleasure in teaching than Bro. Dugan, and in this work especially he has probably exerted the deepest and most lasting influence of his life for the cause of Christ. Our readers we are sure will be pleased with the excellent picture of Bro. Dungan upon our first page again this week, this time as the president of Christian University.

- —The annual convention of the Churches of Christ in Pike County, Ill., will be held in Pittsfield, beginning with a sermon by N. E. Cory on Tuesday evening, Aug. 29. The convention sessions will be held on Wednesday, Aug. 29. On Wednesday night G. L. Wharton, missionary from India, will deliver an address.
- The seventh annual convention of the Churches of Christ in the eighth district of Illinois will be held in Marion Sept. 13-16. A large and interesting program is out already for this convention. The railroads entering Marion have granted reduced rates and free entertainment will be given for all who attend. The invitation from J. J. Harris, president and chairman of the committee, Marion, is for all to come The elders of the church also say, Come.
- The church at Plano, Tex., desires to secure a good, strong man as its pastor. A man with a family preferable, but he must be a comparatively young man, pious, a good preacher and a good "mixer." They have a pretty, new church building, finished a year ago, costing $6,700, nicely furnished and free of debt, a nice five-roomed parsonage next door to the church, on which there is an indebtedness of $500, falling due Sept. 1, 190°, but which the brethren propose to pay off when due. They have approximately 130 members. Can pay a good, pushing man a good salary, but he must be capable of taking and holding first place among preachers in the town. Address D. A. Peoples, Plano, Tex.
- -The Christian Helper is the name of a new monthly journal of sixteen pages, devoted to primitive Christianity, published at Harper, Kansas. This journal is edited and published by A. G. Lucas, and the copy before us, Vol. I., No. 1, is a journal of many commendable qualities, especially that of challenging the correctness of positions taken by prominent writers in other journals. We refer to a criticism in its columns of Dr. Tyler's letter concerning the Pilgrims. But since another has criticised Bro. Tyler in our columns we need not mention that of the Helper. But the Helper's criticism is not in bad spirit; neither is it a hypercritical journal; at least not this copy. On the other hand it is newsy, comprehensive, instructive and worthy of the most liberal patronage. We wish the Christian Helper a happy voyage on the troubled sea of religious journalism.
- -Barton W. Stone, of Milwaukee, Wis., a grandson of Barton W. Stone of history, writing concerning the death of Bro. Procter says:

We have truly lost a great and good man and I know all will feel sad when they know of his death. He was the man who baptized most of us, who elevated our minds, who made our natures better, who joined us in wedlock, who came to see us in sickness, who whispered words of hope when our loved ones passed away and who taught us how to live by giving an example in his own life.

-The Bethany C. E. Reading Courses management has announced a series of articles on vital topics by our best writers for the next year that promise greater interest and attraction than any yet published. The articles are classified under three heads supplementary to a "Study of the English Bible," to "Our Pioneers and Their Plea" and to "Christian Missions." It is not too early to begin now to prepare for the next year's courses. The King's Businesss, a well-edited and interesting magazine of 32 pages, published at Cleveland, Ohio, has been made the special organ of the Reading Course management and should go into every Y. P. S. C. E. of the Church of Christ; better still, into every household. Send for this magazine. Also for information about the handbooks and literature for the next year's Reading Courses. Address J. Z. Tyler, Cleveland, O.

Dr. Albert Buxton recently preached at Hillsboro, Texas, to an audience of men in uniform, consisting of the military company, the fire companies and the Woodmen of the World.

F. D. Power is giving a series of Sunday eve-ning talks on "The Prince of Dreamers and His Dreams," in which he deals with Bunyan and his times, and some of the salient chapters of his immortal book.

C. E. Millard, of Maysville, Mo., is now at home again from Fountain Park Chautauqua, where he had charge of the music. After a few days at home he will again enter the field as singing evangelist and will give musical recitals.

After eight years of married life W. W. Burks, now paster of the church in I arsons, Kan., and his wife, now rejoice in the arrival of their first born-a son. Bro. Burks has been four years with the church in Parsons.

On the evening of August 23, in the lectureroom of the Allegheny Church, a farewell reception in which the Central and East End Churches of Pittsburg participated, was extended to Bro. Sco-ville, preparatory to his tour in Europe.

O. W. Kemberling, of Remington, Ind., desires correspondence with any church or churches in need He is not looking of preaching or pastoral work. for an easy place or big salary, but a field for work. He can give satisfactory references for efficiency.

E. Finley Mahon, of Shelbyville, Ind., has returned from his three months' tour in Europe and is again at work in his old field. The church has sold its old property, purchased a fine new lot and begin the building of a new church house soon.

The church in Springfield, Mass., which E. C. Davis has served for two years, has granted him leave of absence to pursue a course of study in in Hiram College next year. In his abscence the church will secure a pastor and urge on its work. Bro. Davis hopes to be of service to some congregation within reach of Hiram College.

J. A. Miller, of Pardee, Kansas, writing of Bro. Procter's death says: "Nearly forty years ago Bro. Procter visited my home congregation, which is now known as Old Union Church, twelve miles south of St. Joseph, Buchanan Co, Mo. I was then young, but his discourse and his genial, lov-ing disposition left an impress which has always sent a thrill to my heart when I would see his name in print or read an article from his pen; and when I saw his picture on the first page of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST I recognized the same at once. I learned to love him as a very dear brother."

The Messenger, Lexington, Ky., recently contained a picture and biographical sketch of F. W. Allen, concluding with these words: "Since April, 1898, he has been minister at Stanford, Ky., where he is held in highest esteem by every one, and where he is doing a splendid work for his and where he is doing a splendid work for his Master. He is one of our very best preachers, a man of rare social and moral qualities and of sterling integrity and literary attainments. May God richly bless him in his work." We understand that Bro. Allen is likely to visit Missouri in the near future and we should be glad to hear of some one of our strong churches capturing him. He belongs to Missouri and was only loaned to Kentucky for a season. Kentucky for a season.

Elder L. A. Pocock, of Sedgewick, Kan., was recently called to Lebanon Kas., to set the church there in order. There were no conversions, but his work was made effective in other ways. The church at Lebanon was greatly pleased with the labors of Bro. Pocock and commend him strongly to any church in need of a pastor, pastoral work or a protracted meeting.

Bethany Church, Evansville, Inc., granted their minister, Will A. Bellamy, a month's vacation. He spent the first week at Bethany Park, Ind., the remainder of the time visiting relatives in Michigan and Ohio. Bro. Bellamy is the first pastor that young church has had and it is his first ministry. Seventy-four have been added to the church during the past year. He begins his second year Sept. 1st, with an increase of $100 in his salary.

On Aug. 6, 1899, Jas. T. Nichols preached his first sermon in Vinton, Iowa, having received a call from the congregation to take the new work which had just been organized by Bro. D. D. Boyle. Since that time they have built and paid for a church building which, with its furnishings, costs not less than $5,000. But best of all, within that time they have had 143 additions to the church; 101 of whom were by baptism. During church; 101 of whom were by death and 10 the time they lost four members by death and 10 by letter, leaving a net gain of 129 This has been done with home forces. Bro. Nichols has been asked by the united voice of the congregation to remain indefinitely. Of course, the call was accepted.

A Recollection of Bro. Procter.

MY DEAR BRO. GARRISON:-I have recently read your address and editorial in the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST of Aug. 9 on the character and death of Bro. Alexander Procter.

Your words move me to break my long silence and tell you how dear his memory is to me, and how much I appreciate what you say of him. I first met him at old Antioch Church in Randolph County, Mo., near which I was living at the time, 1860. There I heard him preach some of his impressive and splendid sermons for which he was so remarkable. I recall with vividness and unflagging pleasure after forty years a sermon I heard him preach there on "The Divinity and Coronation of Jesus." It was a sermon not soon to pe forgotten. I can see him now, as he stood then, with glowing, upturned face, radiant as the face of an angel, while, as if he had been an eyewitness, he spoke of the incidents and glory of the coronation. I think his audience shared with me in the desire to sing "All hail the power of Jesus' name," which we did heartily when he had concluded.

Having dwelt with such power and splendor upon the cororation as a great fact he turned with a tenderness and beauty all his own and spoke at length upon the reason and divine philosophy which underlies the great transaction.

Glorious man, blessed of God and honored of men, though being dead he yet speaketh! Now that the veil has been removed, and he walks

Why let all your neighbors and friends think you must be twenty years older than you are? Yet it's impossible to look young with the color of 70 years in the hair. It's sad to see young persons look prematurely old in this way. Sad because it's all unnecessary; for gray hair may always be restored to its natural color by using ---- amid the splendors of the house not made with hands, he understands better than before the glory and honor of him whom God hath highly exalted and given him a name which is above every name. Shall we not have a volume of his sermons published? I hope so. Surely, such utterances as were his upon the eternal verities of God among men ought to have a more permanent form than the spoken word.

Moses the Man of God is a volume of over three hundred pages, by Dr. D. R. Dungan, containing a faithful record of the life of the most wonderful character of Old Testament Times, and aside from "The Man of Galilee," probably the greatest character the human race has produced. The information contained in the book is drawn from the Scriptures and other reliable historical sources. Price, $1.00. Christian Publishing Company.

Maxinkuckee Assembly.

The state of Indiana is rich in summer assemblies. Many families in this state go from the cities, towns, villages and farms during the hot weather and spend days and weeks in social, literary and religious fellowship. Maxinkuckee Assembly, Culver, Ind., is a new candidate of this kind for public favor. On July 26 this assembly opened up with a nest, new tabernacle and quite a large hotel. The park is beautifully located on the bank of Lake Maxinkuckee. Just on the bank of the lake and at the front of the park lies the Vandalia R. R. line and just beyond are the boats on the lake. It is a beautiful, clear lake, almost as large as a congressional township. This makes it large enough to cool the atmosphere somewhat in the evening. This is not very far from the great lakes of the North, and is somewhat affected for good during hot weather on this account.

Some of the men back of this enterprise are J. V. Coombs, Dr. W. E. Cullane, W. E. M. Hackleman, J. O. Ferrier, T. J. Legg and others. While things are still new and it requires some time to get things in shape, there is here everything out of which an ideal assembly ground will come. This is especially true when we consider the splendid names alone who have the enterprise in hand. There are splendid locations here for cottages and tents and everything necessary for happiness and comfort.

The program for this year was an elaborate one, and a number of the best speakers in the brotherhood were present. Among them we heard Pres. J. W. McGarvey in several addresses, Henry Pritchard, A. W. Connor, J. B. Briney, Geo. F. Hall and others. We also met J. P. Lichtenberger, pastor at Buffalo, N. Y.; H. C. Kenrick, pastor at Logansport, Ind.; J. H. O. Smith, Chicago, and a number of others whose names have escaped us. Here is an excellent place to come in contact with great lives and enjoy the comfort and rest needed by constant G. A. HOFFMANN. toilers.

Disciples' Divinity House Extension Lectureship.

A a new departure has been inaugurated by the Divinity House in the way of an extension lectureship for the purpose of sending out lecturers among the churches. The purpose of it is to carry to the churches among the Disciples the courses of instruction given in the University of Chicago by members of the Church of Christ. Dr. H. L. Willett, Errett Gates and Prof. W. D. MacClintock are announced as lecturers for the season, beginning Oct. 1, 1900.

Dr. Willett's lectures will deal with subjects relating to the Old and New Testaments. Mr. Gates' with subjects relating to the New Testament, Church History, and History and Work of the Disciples. Prof. MacClintock's with subjects relating to Literature.

The lectures will be given in courses of six, covering one week, with one a day, or covering three days, with three a day.

Dr. Willett offers such courses as "The History of Prophecy," "The Beginnings of Christianity," "The Life and Work of Paul."

Mr. Gates offers such courses as "The Teaching of Jesus," "The Early Days of Christianity" and "The Origin of the Disciples."

Prof. MacClintoch offers such lectures as "The Church's Hymns: A Study in the Poetry of Religion," "Browning's Saul: Reading and Interpretation of a Masterpiece of Religious Poety."

Special plans have been devised for bringing these lectures within the reach of many of our churches. Any church or society desiring to secure any of these lecturers will address Errett Gates, Discitles' Divinity House, University of Chicago, for terms and dates.

A Glimpse of Alexander Procter.

It was only a glimpse in the Missouri Lectureship at Liberty, some years ago. But the impression lingers of a stalwart form and thoughtful brow, a lofty mind, a fearless thinker, a brave and generous spirit. He scorned limitations and definitions. He was a seer, a prophet. He thought, because he had as good a right to think as any other man that ever lived. You felt that while listening to his public utterances he would break through logical forms and definitions, seeking to answer one quotation-is it true?

When will we learn that God dwells not in forms and doctrines written by hand any more than "in temples made by hands;" that he is not limited to the record of some of his dealings with men in the past, but that "in him we live and move and have our being?"

The Bethany C. E. Reading Courses.

According to the new schedule of the Bethany C. E. Reading Courses the months of October, November and Deecmber are to be given up entirely to Bible study. Supplementary to the required readings in their admirable handbooks our church papers will publish articles by more than fifty of our best writers on the following subjects:

- 1. The Growth of the Bible. (Showing its construction.)
- 2. How We got our English Bible. (History of translations.)
- 3. Helpful Hints for Beginners in Bible Study.
- 4. How to Study the Historical Books of the Old Testament.
- 5. How to Study the Prophetic Literature of the Old Testament.
 - 6. How to Study the Psalms.
 - How to Study the Wisdom Literature.
 - How to Study the Gospel Narratives.
 - 9. How to Study the Book of Acts.
- How to Study the Epistles of Paul.
- 11. How to Study the Writings of John.
- How to Study the Epistle to the Hebrews.

13. How to Study James, Peter and Jude. The Bethany C. E. Bulletin, quarterly, has been merged into the King's Business, a 32 page monthly, and that is now the official organ of the Bethany C. E. Reading Courses. For full information concerning these Courses, write J. Z. Tyler, 798 Republic St., Cleveland, Ohio.

Dedication at Glen-Campbell, Pa.

Having been invited to be present at the opening and dedication of the new house of worship at Glen-Campbell, Pa., we left home on Friday, Aug. 17th, and after a long journey reached our destination on Saturday afternoon.

We found a small band of devoted Disciples who had built a beautiful house of worship, and who had made all necessary preparations for its formal opening and dedication on the following day. We were glad to meet brethren from many of the surrounding congregations, including some half dozen preachers who are faithful and true proclaimers of the old Jerusalem gospel, and who are striving to plant primitive Christianity in that part of the Keystone State.

Glen-Campbell is a town of some 2,500 inhabitants nestling among the hills of Indiana county, Pa. The hills are full of coal, and mining seems to be the chief business. We are told that the miners receive good wages and money is plenty, so that it seems an opportune time to build up churches in that section of the state. The dedicatian services were exceedingly pleasant, and we think profitable. The giving was generous and the rejoicing among the brethren great.

We will remain during the week and preach and lecture, and hope that good may be accomALCOOL de MENTHE Peppermint Alcohol. The only genuine A Refreshing Drink—a few drops in a s of sweetened water instantly quenches et and makes a healthy and delightful drink.

Vacation Notes.

We took the month of July for our vacati and spent it among friends in Iowa. By invit tion we spent the 15th with the church at Fine ford, where 26 years ago last March I preach my first sermon. The church has been organize for 30 years and is in very fair condition, with young pastor. On the 22ad by invitation preached to the Congregational Church at Trawhere Mrs. F.'s people hold membership-a lar and prosperous church. On the 29th I filled t Christian pulpit in Garvin, where Bro. Broke ministers. In the evening I spoke to a uni meeting, and enjoyed the acquaintance and for lowship of the people. Here I met my broth and part of his family from Ft. Dodge. We a rived at home Aug. 4th in time to bury Moth Whetstone, in her 87th year.

he Lands of the Long Day-VIII.

WITH THE LAPLAND OVERLAND MAIL.

Enare may fairly be called the central part of innish Lapland. It is marked on the maps in rge letters and I had expected to find it a goodzed place. And so it is. It is larger than the ty of London-in one way. Although it is laid own as a town on the shore of the great Enare ake, the houses of the Forest-master, the Landsan (police office and postmaster), the landhandler storekeeper) and the parson were scattered over space of eighteen miles. These four and their amilies constitute the entire white population of nare. It is, of course, rank injustice as well as aulty ethnology to speak of the Lapps as other han white people, for most of them are in reality ecided blondes. But as regards manner of life here is a distinct gap between the Lapps and the inns. Swedes and Norwegians whom one finds on he borders of Lapland and at long intervals n the interior, and the distinction is conveniently epresented by the terms "white" and "not white."

The Forest-master of Enare is pre-eminently white. I knocked at his door late one afternoon. fter tramping fifteen miles through a marsh in a reezing rain and riding some more miles in the ame rain in a very wet canoe. He answered my reeting in cheery English, broken but withal weet to my ear. I believe he is the only man in apland who speaks a word of the language. He ook me into his comfortable home, gave me dry arments in place of my wet ones and asked me o questions until I was seated before the fire, dry nd warm, shod with his own slippers and drinkng tea, Russian fashion, out of a glass. Then e gave vent to his surprise at my unexpected appearance and was eager to know the whence and whither of my journey. Learning that I proosed going on south by way of Kittila, he sugested that I stop with him a day and then "walk with the post," the Lapp mail-carrier who would tart on the second morning on his semi-monthly ramp of five days to Kittila. This would insure ne a guide straight through to the point where he road begins which leads on south, and would bviate those tedious delays which had hitherto accompenied the process of securing new guides and porters two or three times a day. The sugrestion seemed a good one. I decided to adopt t, to spend a day in this hospitable home, and then to proceed with the Overland Mail.

When this matter had been arranged I asnumed the role of questioner and maintained it ather steadily until my departure. It was a great privilege to be shut in by the wilderness and the weather in company with a man who knew everything which I wanted to find out, and who was discursive in conversation without being garulous. The title of "Forest master" indicated, as soon found out, that he had the supervision of the cutting and sale of the timber on the government land in a district about a hundred miles square. All Finland is divided into such districts. each under the care of a government official who receives his appointment only after passing an examination in forestry. Here in this remote corcer nearly all of the land belongs to the government, and the Forest-master shares with the Landsman the distinction of representing to the Lapps the sum-total of all earthly authority.

The Forest-master's family and home were, I have reason to believe, typically Finnish. They were Finlanders by blood and had been educated partly in the southern and more civilized part of the country. The mother was a quiet and retiring body whose manners impressed me as English.

The daughter, an uncommonly pretty blonde of the Swedish type, had both education and refinement, dressed with taste, and was in general the sort of girl one would least expect to meet in the middle of Lapland. The two young men had lived much in the forest and, as is usually the case, reflected the wildness of their environment more to their detriment. The entire family spoke Finnish, Swedish and Lappish, but the ordinary language of the home was Swedish, as it is among most people of the better class in Finland. The meals and meal hours were also in the Swedish fashion. Coffee and cakes were served two or three times in the course of the morning, beginning before one is out of bed. Breakfast came at eleven o'clock, dinner between four and five and supper at nine. At frequent intervals throughout the day the maid brought in coffee, for which, late in the afternoon, tea began to be substituted. The latter is always served to men in glasses, but to the ladies in cups.

My host was not only a Finlander by birth, but a patriotic, anti-Russian Finlander. Of the political relations between Russia and Finland, more perhaps later. Nominally, Finland is an autonomous grand-duchy, whose only relation to Russia is that the Czar is its Grand-Duke. But here on the very frontier I had a vivid illustration of the Russian type of government. The semimonthly post was due to arrive the morning after I came to the house of the Forest-master. For two weeks he had had no news of the world's doings and I, traveling in untrodden paths in the north, had not seen a despatch from China or South Africa for nearly a month. We were both eager for the arrival of the postman with a bundle of papers, the issues of the Nya Pressen, the leading daily of Helsingfors, for the last two weeks. Instead there came one copy (three weeks old) and a little printed sip stating with pathetic brevity the bare fact the Nya Pressen had been discontinued by order of the Russian press censor. Like all the other papers in Finland, it had editorially opposed the measures of Russification which the Czar's agents are carrying on in Finland contrary to the constitution of Finland, which has been confirmed by every Cza: during the present century. As a warning to the others, the most prominent paper in the country has been permanently suppressed and two others suspended for one month by order of the Russian censor. So we, here in the far north, must be without news for several more days and, what is of more serious import, the cause of Finish autonomy is left without an organ.

In wandering through many lands I have had occasion to observe that in many respects poor, fallen humanity is a pretty good thing; that the temperature of the human heart averages a long way above the freezing point, and that the dwellers under almost any sky will gradually treat a stranger as well as he will allow himself to be treated. But certainly I never encountered hospitality of a warmer and more enthusiastic sort than here in latitude sixty-nine at the house of the Forest-master of Enare. It was that cheerful and exuberant type of hospstality which does all it can for you, wishes it could do more, and still contrives to leave its beneficiary with the sense of having conferred a great favor in allowing himself to be entertained. I knocked at the door uninvited and unintroduced, and was received into the bosom of the family as an honored guest. I was lodged in the best room in the house and feasted upon the best things which Lapland produces or imports—a substantial blessing which I could appreciate after six days of hard travel without a warm meal. And when I went away it was with a hamper of provisions for the five days' journey to Kittila. Besides all this, the Forest-master sent with me his own manservant, Johan by name, and a half-breed Lapp by race to be my porter, guide, valet de chambre, cook, "second girl," interpreter and general

The next stage of the journey, from Enare to Kittila, was through a country more wild and desolate than that from Utsyoki to Enare. Early on the second morning after my arrival at the latter place I boarded the Forest master's little sailboat, accompanied by that kindly official himself and my "man Friday" (alias Johan), and sailed a few miles down the Kaamas River to the Landsman's house, where we found the mail-carrier ready to start. Postie was a Lapp and dressrd as such, with a big leather pouch containing the mail and his provisions slung on his back. He wore also a pair of leather leggings and a twinkling smile which never seemed to me to be localized in his face, but rather to ratiate indiscriminately from all parts of his wiry form. With him were two other men, racia'ly composite like Johan, who proposed making the journey with us as far as Kittila. I bade adieu to my host and our little caravan of five entered the wilderness.

The five days which we occupied in making that hunired and sixty miles were days of rich experiences. The responsibility of determining the time for stops and starts, of securing new guides, of obtaining food, was now removed from my shoulders. Postie led the way and set the pace; Johan carried my baggage on the march, made my coffee and secured for me such edibles as were to be obtained from place to place; and all I had to do was to move when the procession moved, stop when it stopped, eat what was set before me and "shoo" my own mosquitoes. It was really too easy. And yet, of course, one cannot be said to be actually passive in a regime which calls for thirty or forty miles of walking daily over a path which never failed to be either bristling with sharp stones or sunk shin-deep in marsh.

The topography of the country is rather simple. It is almost level, but crossed occasionally by lines of low hills, mere ridges, which are frequent enough so that one never has the sensation of being in a great plain. By these successive ridges the assent is made almost imperceptibly to the watershed between the Arctic Ocean and the Baltic Sea. The nature of the soil is such, being apparently a kind of peat, that it does not drain readily even where the slope is considerable, and swamps are therefore almost continuous except on the very highest points. The traveler must, for the most part, make his way through these as best he can, but in many places where they would be quite impassable logs have been laid lengthwise on cross-supports. In at least three places which I remember this construction is extended to a length of two or three miles and in that distance it becomes wearing to the nerves, especially as the logs are thin, slippery and often

It is needless to say that there are mosquitoes in these swamps. But that is a subject upon which I do not care to speak. No one who has been through this country can fully express his sentiments in regard to Lapland mosquitoes in any publication intended for general civilization through the mails. The faithful Johan carried the fur coat, which had saved me from freez ing on the Tana River ten days before, and I wore a mosquitoe net over my head and carried a fan. The trees individually are not large enough to be impressive, but collectively they add a pleasing element to the landscape, for there is but little of the ground that is not covered with a thick growth of pine and birch. These elements of swamp, ridge and forest do not promise any great picturesqueness of scenery, and indeed one does not find here anything superlatively grand or beautiful. But the scenic value of the situation will be underestimated and its peculiar charm missed unless one takes into account the admirable atmospheric effects over these green levels, the curious impression produced by the continual day and the nightly recurring phenomenon of the midnight sun.

One whose chief interest lies in the people rather than in the topography of a country will have reason to regret the sparsity of the population. The first day several small lakes lay along the line of our route. We took advantage of these and were in boats most of the day. That day we saw three houses, including the one at which we stopped for the night. Next day we tramped from eight in the morning until nine at night, saw no human habitation during that time, and slept that night in an uninhabited hut on the watershed between the Arctic Ocean and the Baltic Five hours of walking the next day brought us to a house, forty-six miles from the last one. Houses being so scarce, we of course stopped at all of them and saw all the people that there were. After all, it is something to have an exhaustive acquaintance with the inhabitants of any considerable strip of country. In a city one can know only a fraction of one per cent. of the people and must form his opinion of the city by generalization upon this narrow basis But in Finnish Lapland, where the population is said not to exceed a thousand, I saw not less than twenty per cent, of this number, saw them in their homes, slept in their beds, ate their food and sat at their hearths-and can therefore feel comparatively sure that my judgments are not based on exceptional and unrepresentative individuals.

I have already paid my tribute to the honesty and hospitality of the Lapps and wish to emphasize it. It is a wild country and they are a half barbarous people, but one can travel among them and with them with the most perfect feeling of security. I was alone in the wilderness five days with these four men and was unarmed save for the hunting-knife at my side. They knew that I was making a long journey and was carrying a good deal of money-a small fortune to them. And yet I defy any one, after seeing the men and learning something of Lapp character by previous experience to feel the least uneasiness in such a situation. But in spite of these virtues it must be admitted that in their houses they are very much like beasts. My faithful Johan appeared to realize this, for whenever we stopped at a house he would try to shut me off into the little "hall room" which many Lapp huts have as a storeroom and bedroom. Generally I didn't go, however, unless there was sleeping to be done, for whether the people were dirty or not I wanted to see them, so I went with the rest into the main room where the big fireplace was and where the family lived.

Taking them in groups and in the house, they are certainly not an attractive people. But singly and out-of-doors it was another matter. A fellow whose appearance had been most unprepossessing as he sat by the fire changing his shoes would develop qualities of comradeship just such as one wants in a companion on a hunting or fishing trip. Of the dozen or so Lapps who served me as porters, guides or boatmen at one time or another there was not one with whom I did not at once get on terms of friendly intimacy, so far as linguistic limitations would permit; there was not one whose sterling qualities I did not come to respect, or whom I would not gladly have kept with me to the end of the jour-

Next to their honesty the most striking feature of the Lapp temperament is the absence of violent emotions. I have never seen one of them excited, surprised, angry, grieved, in haste or amused, in more than the mildest measure. The most acute symptoms os delight which I ever noticd in any them were those exhibited by Johan when, on reaching Kittala, I gave him a substantial present in cash. He shook my hand with great fervor-they are great on shaking hands-smiled a radiant smile and fervently repeated "kutoski" (which is Finnish for "thank you") until he was out of sight and hearing. So my man Friday went back to his wilderness and I, looking out of the window, was thankful that I could see there road leading south.

New York Letter.

The New York Letter comes this time from Tennessee, as it did the last from Kentucky. People frequently ask: "Is it not almost unbearably warm in East Tennessee for one accustomed to a Northern climate?" After many summers' rustication in this beautiful country we can gladly say there are few places where one can spend the heated term with more comfort and restfulness. Though farther to the South it is much cooler than central Kentucky. The days here are hot, but the nights generally are cool and pleasant, so that in the morning one gets up rested and renewed. So pleasant are these days of the vacation that they are passing away all too rapidly. Already we are looking up time-tables, boat schedules and rates for the homeward trip, after which the routine work must begin,

But withal this has been a most delightful vacation. The journeyings to and fro have been long and warm, but as pleasant as the improved facilities of modern palacial railway train- afford. After merging from the rugged, picturesque mountains of West Virginia and Eastern Kentucky, the flying Chesapeake & Ohio train (though not the F. F. V.) took us bounding through a portion of one of the finest countries on earth - the famous bluegrass region. Though having been brought up in that section, it never before seemed quite so fair and flourishing as on that first day of August, 1900. As one speeds on toward Lexington the improved character of the people is more and more noticeable in their style of dress, courteous demeanor and intelligent faces, as also in their highly cultivated estates. Two or three days' travel in a railway train, from New York to Lexington and thence to Knoxville, afford the studious observer excellent opportunities for good lessons in human character. On such a trip one will be almost certain to meet the pig that has been dressed up in clothes so as to make him look something like a human creature. Though, if it were not for his clothes, one might conclude he had gotten into a hog car, judging by the growling, grunting, rooting, eating and the smell-not unpiglike. Evidently, if he were turned loose the other pigs in the barn lot would have to stand aside. But, on the other hand, one is made glad again and again at the beautiful exhibitions of kindliness and courtesy on the part of one's companions in travel. Of the many types met with on the American railway train these two by contrast start the mind reflecting; but we must not indulge in this train of thought lest we write a sermon, which is not our purpose just now. As we were about to say, Lexington, our objective point, was reached in time and then in a few minutes we were resting at the home of a brother in the flesh and in the Lord, Prof. J. C. Willis, who is president of the Normal College and also vicepresident of Kentucky University, of which the Normal College is an organic part. His work, though comparatively new, has proven eminently successful, as have been all other departments of the university and also the College of the Bible during the last year. It has been reported of lase that the university is in an uncertain financial condition. It was rumored in New York a year or so since that the institution was approaching a financial crisis and that the outlook was threatening. Such a report, because untrue, was eminently unjust, and in the nature of the case hurtful. The only possible basis for such a rumor was the fact that about $20,000 of the endowment fund could not find proper investment and certain other invested funds suffered a reduction in percentage of interest. This, of course, cut down somewhat the usual income of the institution, but it is to be hoped that it will be only temporary. This condition of affairs is a good text on which every preacher in Kentucky, at least, ought to deliver a homily to his people. The great brotherhood of that state should take the lead and give so readily and liberally toward an adequate endowment of Kentucky University and the College of the Bible that soon the rich men of other stat s would grandly supplement all that might be needed. The alumni of these schools and the churches, blessed by their la ors should hasten to remove the burning disgrace upon them through the almost criminal negligence of duty on this matter. Let us have in the College of the Bible a McGarvey Chair of Sacred History, a Grubbs Chair of New Testament Exegesis and a Graham Chair of Moral Philosophy. We ought to show in this practical manner our due appreciation of these grand and godly men; these princely teachers of Christ's messengers to dying men, and at the same time prove ourselves and their influence through us a permanent blessing to mankind. I am ready to join all others who appreciate and love these dear brethren and the institution to which they have given the best of their lives in such an effort. Brethren, what do you say?

On Lord's day, August 4, we had the pleasure of listening to a good sermon by Prof I. B. Grubbs in the Broadway Church, Bro. Mark Collis, the pastor, being absent in a series of meetings. In the evening we were disappointed upon arrival at the Central Church to learn that Bro. I. J Spencer, the pastor, was out of the city and no service would be held. But the next day, though excessively hot, brought with it many precious and some sad memories. Wife and I drove out into Anderson County to my old boyhood home on Crooked Creek. Being an amateur photographer, I took a few "snap-shots" of the old home and was made to feel anew the force of the poet's language:

"How dear to my heart are the scenes of my child-

When fond recollection presents them to view; The orchard, the meadow, the deep-tangled wildwood.

And every loved spot that my infancy knew."

Hereafter, the photographs will refresh and enkindle memories of "dewy youth." Among the most sacred of all these places is that where our dear father's body rests in the grave on a lonely hill back of the old home, a waiting the glories of the resurrection morn. He was good and just and noble and true. He loved God and good men. His reward is sure. Standing by his grave we wept because we shall not see his face here again; but we rejoiced that he rests from his labors and his good works follow him.

At the Park Avenue Church, Knoxville, we had the pleasure, Lord's day, August 19, of looking once again into the faces of many dear old friends and of preaching to those to whom we ministered in word and doctrine regularly many years ago. It is a pleasure to see one's children in the gospel growing up into usefulness in the kingdom, and to grasp the hand of those who have been so faithful and true to the highest interests of the Church of Christ. Among such at Knoxville is Elder Lewis Tilman, one of God's noble men, who has stood for Christ and his cause through all the years of toil and sacrifice and change. Bro. R. L. Stewart, the beloved pastor of this flock, was in Canada on his vacation. We were sorry not to have seen him. The Third Church also is prospering under the ministry of Bro. Wilson. We are sorry not to have had an opportunity of meeting him and his people. S. T. WILLIS.

B. B. Tyler's Letter.

Bishop C. C. McCabe, of the Methodist Episcopal Church, was mentioned in my letter last week. The bishop is a believer in the payment of tithes for the support of the church, not merely as a matter of policy, but of law. He thinks that the part of the law relating to tithes-the law of Moses-has not been repealed. It is more than doubtful if this position can be maintained. But the good bishop is full of interesting facts showing the value of systematic and proportionate giving. He says, as an illustration, that the Seventh day Advent Church at Battle Creek, Mich., had an income in a single year of $25,750. The church has 1,400 members. How can so large a sum be raised by so small a number of persons? By each one paying regularly and conscientiously one-tenth of his income into the treasury of the church. The bishop declares that if the Methodist people would give as the Battle Creek Adventists give they would put $60,000,000 into the Lord's treasury for the extension of the kingdom of righteousness this year. As to the correctness of this statement I may as well confess that I have my doubts. I would not quote the bishop's language as to the amount that would come into the church treasury in a single year if the Methodists would give as do the Adventists as if the proposition were certainly correct. Better take out your pencil and do some figuring first. This, however, is certain beyond a preadventure: the income of the Church of Christ would be enormously increased if all who are recognized as members of it would systematically give as they are prospered of the Lord. Comparatively few contribute in this way. Contributions are made in a slipshod, haphazard, hit-ormiss kind of way. A sense of stewardship is seldom found. "I will give if I feel like it, and if I do not feel like it I will not give," expresses the principle on which the average church member makes his contributions to the treasury of the Lord. There is need of a revival in the church universal at this point. The man who insists that the law of Moses is in force as to the payment of tithes is rendering an invaluable service in this way; he is assisting to awaken an interest in a matter of great importance. The welfare of the church is largely involved in this revival. Look into your Bible and see what it says on the subject of giving. The lamented A. M. Atkinson used to say that there is no peril to which men are exposed against which they are so carefully guarded and solemnly warned as that involved in the accumulation and possession of Bishop McCabe calls attention to the fact that one secret of the success of Mormonism is that the payment of tithes is a part of the system. In this he is correct. The Mormon Church has an abundance of money with which to carry on its propaganda work.

The adherents of John Alexander Dowie pay tithes to "Zion." John went to Chicago less than a dozen year ago, friendless and penniless. He now owns a tabernacle on Michigan Avenue, with seatings for more than three thousand persons and worth possibly $100,000. He owns the "Zion Hotel," on the same avenue, having a value about equal to that of the tabernacle. In the same neighborhood is his bank building and college. It is not extravagant to say that Dowie has in that part of Chicago property worth in the neighborhood of a quarter of a million of dollars. There are smaller tabernacles in three or four other parts of the city belonging to "Zion"-only another name for Dr. (?) John Alexander Dowie! Recently, he has purchased more than 6,000 acres of land not far from Chicago on which he proposes to build the "City of Zion." How is this done? So far as money is concerned, by the payment of tithes. All members of "Zion" pay promptly and regularly to the head of the movement one-tenth of their income. Poor people, men and women of limited incomes, in the main, are enlisted in this movement, but the aggregate of their contributions is enormous.

Why should not the Church of Christ have the best financial system? Why should the best methods of obtaining money be turned over to humbugs and fraudulent institutions?

The Hebrew people were under law. It was in harmony with the genius of that institution that a tithe of the income of its people should be specifically designated as belonging to the Lord. The law under which the Jews lived was specific. Its details are tiresome even to read. Simon Peter, in the Jerusalem council, referring to them. said: "Which neither our fathers nor we were able to bear." Christians "are not under law, but under grace." The Old Testament is in large part a book of statutory laws. The Old Testament is the book of the Hebrew religion. The New Testament is a book of principles. It is the book of the Christian religion. A law in the New Testament requiring the payment of a specified sum would be out of place. "As he may prosper" is the New Testament presentation of this matter. These words mean proportionate giving. Paul said "let each one of you." This was his "order" to the church in Corinth and to "the churches of Galatia." "Each one" ought to be the rule in our congregations to-day. How common it is to hear: "A few in our church have to pay all the expenses" We make much of the church that was in Jerusalem. 'Tis well. Note the conduct of its members in money matters. This is what is called "primitive Christianity." Has it been restored? "As many as were possessors of land or houses sold them and brought the prices of the things that were sold and laid them at the apostles' feet: and distribution was made unto each according as any one had need." This statement represents the spirit of the religion that is pure and undefiled before God.

I am not writing an essay on "Giving." I am not attempting to elucidate the subject of "Christian Stewardship." This is not a treatise; it is a letter. I am jotting down facts, thoughts, suggestions as they come to me, that I may, if possible, cause you to investigate for yourself the subject about which I am writing. I do not argue for the tenth. This you see. The point on which I insist is that every member of the church should give systematically, not merely from im-pulse, and that he should give a fixed proportion of his income.

If you would look into this subject beyond your own Bible, address Curts and Jennings, 57 Washington St., Chicago. It is claimed that their tracts "will tell you how to be rich forever." They publish tracts on the grace of giving.

P. S .- It is too hot to get mad! In my letter of Aug. 16, for "The Fountain Park Assembly began in 1875" read "The Fountain Park Assembly began in 1895." For "Prof. B. J. Radford, of Eureka College, past philosopher, and lecturer," read "Prof. B. J. Radford, of Eureka College, poet," etc. For "Missouri holds a prominent place on the program," read "missions hold a prominent place," etc.

What shall be done with the newspaper stories of the awful massacre of foreign residents in Pekin? The truth seems to be known at last, and the tales of butchery, and murder to save from a worse fate, are known to be the devilish inventions, not of lying pagans, but of civilized (?) newspaper publishers, "molders of public opinion," "leaders of thought," etc., etc. For years the daily paper has been degenerating. There are to-day, judging from the output, few, if any, that are not controlled by the countingroom. Sensational, tricky, mendacious, vituperative, scandal-mongering, Lord's day desecrating journals are they nearly all. Who knows when he is reading the news? Facts that could be stated in a half dozen terse sentences are strung out over columns with microscopic detail. When the papers confine themselves to the truth they are bad enough, on account of their chain-pump repetitions. Surely, there is room and the time is ripe for a journalism that will "tell truth and shame the devil;" that will inform its readers of what the world is actually doing, and not take from thirty minutes to an hour to do it in. Until "journalism" gets a few leagues nearer truth and deceny and reliability, let us have no more of the vaporings of those who talk about the newspaper as the people's Bible, the purveyor of high class literature and the supplanter of the pulpit.

The Hyde Park Protective Association is a society set for the defence of the prohibition district of Chicago against the inroads of the drink traffickers. Again and again they have brought the pressure of public opinion and the strong arm of the law to bear, not upon the lawbreakers, but upon the negligent public officials whose sworn duty it is to punish lawbreakers. This is applying the scourge in the right place. Recently a number of police officers were censured for neglect of duty, and as a result keepers of "blind pigs" were brought up before the bar and fined. They were also ordered to give bonds as an assurance that they would no longer violate the law. Failing in this they were arraigned again and their fines raised from $25 to $200 each, said to be the limit allowed under the statute. And still "Prohibition don't prohibit!"

Seven hundred boys who are applicants for positions in the Chicago post office will be advised that cigarette smoking renders them ineligible. Heretofore there has been a rule against smoking while on duty, but this is a step in advance. Col. Roberts, who proposed the new rule, says: "Cigarette smoking is the most demoralizing of habits and the boys will have to give it up. We have so many applicants for positions that we select only the very best. Our service is such that we must have the most intelligent and active boys we can find, and we cannot afford to have their energies sapped by cigarette smoking." What is this but more prohibition?

One of the visitors in London and Paris this summer reports having noticed two significant signs. The first was posted up in a London restaurant: "Total abstinence pledges taken at the counter." The second he saw on the shutter of a shop in Paris, gay and godless Paris: 6 Jours pour Travailler et le 7eme pour se Reposer-"Six days for work and the seventh for rest."

Where conditions are normal and the church grows stronger year by year there should be a marked increase in missionary contributions. Whatever the church did last year it should do better this year. Well-doing in the past is no excuse for present failure; it is rather a commitment to well-doing as the rule of life. "Judging the future of the past," this year will be the best in our history in the amounts contributed, and the earnestness and devotion that mark the contributors. Is there a church anywhere that omitted the Church Extension offering last year? Then it is doubly bound to make it this year, to redeem an unworthy past and set a fit precedent for all future conduct. There will be thousands of Disciples watching eagerly for the returns next week. In this work of missionary benevolence we have fellowship one with another and begin to feel the espirit de corps.

Chas. A. Young, recently returned from a trip abroad, is spending a few days in Chicago. He gives as the net result of his impressions, among other things, a deeper determination than ever to push the Bible Chair work. Wm. Brooks Taylor, the indefatigable pastor of the North Side Church. has returned from a few weeks' rest in Kentucky. C. G. Kindred and family summered at Benton Harbor. Bro. Kindred is assisting Pastor G. A. Ragan in a two weeks' meeting at Irving Park, as a sort of vacation finale. E. S. Ames has been called to the pulpit of Hyde Park Church and it is rumored that he will accept. This will add a strong man to the forces in Chicago. Geo. F. Hall, formerly of Decatur, preached Aug. 12th and 19th for Union Church.

The success of the Piedmont Assembly this year has opened the eyes of the Virginia brethren to the possibilities of this important enterprise. The site was well chosen. In a beautiful grove in full view of the Blue Ridge Mountains, near the juncture of three of the Old Dominion's best counties, Orange, Albemarle and Louisa, a beautiful tabernacle with 1,500 sittings has been erected. It is one mile from Gordonsville, surrounded by a fertile region and accessible to the people of forty of our churches.

It is not surprising that the attendance was large and on Lord's days reached up into the thousands. A sum sufficient to clear off all indebtedness was raised and substantial improvements are planned for the coming year.

The chief speaker was C. P. Williamson, of Atlanta, Ga. Bro W. is a master of assemblies. He is a born educator, has years of experience in Chautauqua work, is a versatile preacher, can lead a serenading party, keep company with the hungriest young preacher at the hotel table and keep every resident of the grounds in such a good humor as to cause him to forget that there are discomforts connected with camp life.

Peter Ainslie, of Baltimore; E. L. Powell, of Louisville; P. A. Cave, of Hagerstown, and E. B. Bagby, of Washington, were among those who were glad to enjoy once more the sweet fellowship and gracious hospitality of the people of their native state. One of these in an address said: "I love the old state, I love her broom-sege, her hengrass, her pine trees," etc. An old brother remarked: "Yes, I notice that they love these things, yet they seek greener pastures."

July 30, 31, the Piedmont convention was held. The twenty-three churches in this district reported a membership of 2,696, with a net increase of 238, and contributions amounting to $7,109 53, of which $1,347.35 was for missions. The best showing was made by the ladies of the C. W. B. M. Their offerings amounted to $1,173.43, of which $489.33 was for the endowment of the University of Virginia Bible Chair. Great credit for the success of the assembly is due Bernard P. smith and Richard Bagby, of the committee on program; F. B. Davis, C. H. Walker and W. J. Address

MACBETH, Pittsburgh, Pa.

This feast of good things was continued the following week at the Tidewater convention, held at Rappahannock Church, Essex County, Va. This meeting was one of the best among the thirty-four annual gatherings of this district.

The evangelizing board reported a debt of $113.52 of the previous year canceled, a consider able sum raised for the district evangelists and a comfortable balance in the treasury.

Two new churches, West End, Richmond and Oak Grove, Mathews County, had been enrolled. The mission church at Fredericksburg, under the pastoral care of S. H. Forrer, has doubled its membership. The Educational Fund has been sufficient to sustain three young men at college and reported a balance in hand of $795.56, with total assets of $2,559.11

The thirty churches in this district have a membership of 4,652, added during the year, 404, and raised for all purposes, $24,535.15.

The twenty-two auxilliaries of the C. W. B. M. report an increase in membership of 113 and $1,811.29 raised for all purposes. A collection was taken up for the endowment of the Bible Chair and $200 secured in cash and pledges. When one remembers that the Restoration movement began in Virginia and early secured a foothold in the Piedmont and Tidewater sections, it is a mat ter of surprise that the cause has made such slow progress. A story told by Bro. Williamson may afford a possible explanation. Dr. W. H. Hopson once preached in Bowling Green, Va., on the "Scriptural Ground of Infant Baptism." Col. F. of that town heard the sermon, and remarked to a friend: "Dr. Hopson proved conclusively that there is no scriptural ground for infant baptism. But Dr. H. should understand that infant baptism is an old Virginia custom, that we have no idea of giving

Another story that you are almost sure to hear at a gathering of Virginia brethren is concerning the preacher's attempt to instruct the veteran, Silas Shelburne, who was a famous preacher, but somewhat illiterate: "Bro. S." he said, "you are a powerful and successful preacher, but your sermons would be far more effective if you used better grammar. For instance, you say 'agin' for 'against' and 'gwine' for 'going.' " The old man was silent for a moment and then remarked: "If that's all you got agin me, I'm gwine along."

In no section of any country has the true gospel been preached with greater clearness and force than in old Virginia. The people have heard it, acknowledged their doctrinal errors, but have gone on in the same old way.

Any honest way of paying church debts will receive a hearing at the hands of a multitude of people. Well, here is a plan which if worked will surely do it. It is called the "Church Calendar," and is as follows: One party is the Year and pays $12 for the honor. This party appoints 12 Months each of whom pays $4, or $48. These Months appoint 4 Weeks each, and they pay $1, or $48. The Weeks appoint 7 Days each, and these Days pay 50 cents, or $168. The Days appoint 24 Hours each, and these Hours pay 10 cents, or $806.40. And these Hours appoint 60 Minutes each, and they pay five cents, or $24,192, making a grand total of $25,274.40—enough perhaps to pay off the largest church debt among us. But if not, you only have to order the Minutes to appoint 60 Seconds each, and tax them 21 cents, and you will have the enormons sum of $725.760. Did you ever see anything equal to this? The plan if fully worked is equal to any church debt emergency you ever heard of. But if you weary in working this plan you can stop with the Hours and have the snug sum of $1,082.40, no mean amount when your house is about to be sold. And then, besides all this, as the months are lunar you have the thirteenth to apply to the pipe organ or some other good cause.

Church Extension has the right of way just now, and the first Sunday in September should see that it is well treated. Its record deserves it. Organized in 1888, it has completed 500 church buildings. This is good. But here is the bad part: 1,115 appeals unanswered for lack of funds. Appeals every other day, but only one answered each week

J. M. Tennison has been with us in the interest of the Orphans' Home, of St. Louis. Our people received him gladly, and though many are away, we gave him about $100, and the Washington Ave. Church gave him $25 more.

United States District Attorney W.B Johnson, of Ardnore, I.T., has a backbone. Hear him talk: "Frequent complaints are being made to this office from nearly every town in this district about gambling and the sale of intoxicating liquors, and by the co-operation of town officials who desire to enforce the law, and the law-abiding people, I propose to see that the law is strictly enforced and these evils suppressed. I intend not only to prosecute those who run joints and patronize them, but also the owners of buildings where gambling is permitted."

C. E. Chambers and W. T. Reynolds held a meeting at Chalk Bluff Schoolhouse, where we had only three members and "our plea" was largely unknwon. Fourteen were added and a congregation organized, to which Bro. Reynolds will preach once a month.

Tom Smith has held a meeting at Tufkin and organized a church of 21 members. When he arrived on the ground he found only five members, but they were willing to work. A pastor was employed for half the time, $600 raised for a new house and $76.50 given to the state work.

A. J. Bush, another of our state evangelists, has just closed a meeting at Sutherland Springs, which resulted in a new church of 15 members and a Christian Endeavor Society.

Ferris, the home of S. R. Ezzell, author of the "Great Legacy," has had a hard time for several years in the church work. But David Walk is in a meeting there with 21 additions, and it now looks as if the church would take on new life and become the power for good it should be. Is not this good evangelism? Is it not needed? Is it not as good at least to save an old church from ruin as to organize a new one? If so, where are the Scovills, Updikes, Martine, Northcutts, etc., for this neglected field, so rich and so ripe.

More and more am I becoming convinced by the logic of facts and experience that Texas is a good summer resort. Here is a city of 70,000 people and there has not been a single sunstroke this summer, while they have died in large numbers in many of the Northern cities. More than this, I have been here all summer and have needed light covering every night. These are facts. What do you think of them?

Kansas City Letter.

"Are the Scotch lakes, worth seeing?" asked some one of gruff Dr. Johnson. "Yes, sir; but they are not worth going to see" Strange, wonderful, that these glorious lakes should be so dispraised! But no one ever so spoke or wrote of that summer Mecca of the Disciples, Macatawa. So full of charm is it that though we read that Madam De Stael refused to open her window to look out upon Geneva and the blue, blue waters of its sleeping lake, we feel that the glories of this Michigan bay would have broken down the French woman's indifference to nature's charms. But the reader need fear no attempt at description. For Macatawa's interpretation there is need of artist and poet. Its beauties cannot be set forth in prose nor its idyllic grace and charm. Such a wealth of forest green and lakeside harmless pleasures demand the music and the color of verse and canvas. One in the presence of such haunting fascinations can but marvel that the "tapeworm of European travel," as Emerson somewhat unæsthetically put it, has not the sooner been gotten rid of by Americans and that our world-girters, or by the book, "globe-trotters," should not ere this have discovered the beauty mines in our own land and worked them with ardent love. Here, right at our own doors; here, hard by this rushing, tumultuous, money-loving, money-pursuing, money-getting Chicago are nature's glories and wonders, needing only the poet's song that they may live forever. No Swiss lake is worthy to be compared with these great Northern lakes of ours, and when these, as those waters there in Alpine shadows, shall be lit with song and story, we shall be drunk with the wine of their beauty.

Heigho! After all is not this sturdy Protestant attempting to do what he declared he knew he could not do—let go at once and have the grace to say that waiting the coming of the singer, that genial gentleman, truest hearted friend, who sits with such unaffected dignity in the "Easy Chair," has in numberless prose poems acquainted us with the thousand varying moods of these skies and forests, of flashing waters of this inland sea? He is our present-day Solomon, and the thousands who visit this place, departing ever with the words of the Queen of the South upon their lips: "The half had not been told."

Do you seek beauty? It is here. Grandeur? It is here. Variety in pleasure? It is here. Rest? In the heart of these wild forests and by the waves that idly lap the sands it may be found. For physical rejuvenation, for brain stimulation, for soul enrichment, where can one the better go? If things go on long as now, what Asbury Park is to the Methodists Macatawa will be to the Disciples.

These lines are written at the close of the writers second summer here; written with no axe to grind, the scribe owning, alack! not one single foot of these sand shores, Is it rest now? Yes, but already into its quietness has come the quickening, energizing thought of the larger work to which we hope to go on the to-morrow. These preachers are doffing their Bohemian garb, and with several coats of tan and added pounds and newly gathered energy are hieing homewards, and with the hundreds of other Disciples will do their very best to make generous and large our offerings for Church Extension. Now for the girding on of the armor and the battle royal against inertia. Yes, against inertia. This is our foe. Of opposition there is none. Indifference the rather is to be confronted, and like the bales of cotton that fronted Packenham is no foe to be despised. It looked as if it would be so easy for the Britishers to dispose of such frail defenses. Yes, it looked so. Cotton! Why, if it were granite there would be fear and dread and possible defeat, but cotton! Well, it was not so easy, after all, as our cousins, the red-coated ones, found out. Now this same old battle is to be fought over. No granite walls or frowning forts frown down upon us. Only inertia with its seemingly weak and yielding cotton. How shall we win the battle? There is but one way. You can't batter down cotton defenses, but you can burn them. Argument with its big guns may be of no avail, but zeal with its holy flame can do all things. The religion of fire is the religion that wins. Bloodred earnestness tells. Ah, there is a tremendous power here, the power of the match, the power of gunpowder, the powder of dynamite! Do we need light? Granted. And information? Yea, yea; but most of all, and above all, flame.

On these hot, sweltering days the politician in dead earnest takes off his coat and makes it warmer still for the other side. He doesn't say much, usually; that is, much that is informational or true, but the fever of his madness, or his earnestness, as you will, seizes upon all. Statistics? Recite them all; tell the story statistical of Church Extension and bring to your aid all the sublime argument of fact and accomplishment, but above all see that these figures are bodied forth in flame. Statistics, mere ink statistics, are veriest rubbish, but statistics that have the warmth and glow of fire are Heaven-sent. Our secretaries do us valuable service in the tons upon tons of information they send us, but if only with this precious freight they could send matches and all manner of combustibles! If the work of grace could begin with the preachers and the elders and the deacons, and from thence in everwidening circles flow out until the most indifferent and careless have been reached, and if one and all might be aroused to a tremendous earnestness in this work, what might not be accomplished?

This is the last missionary offering in the last year of a wonderful century. Shall it be worthy of the time, worthy of the Disciples, worthy of the work? We are coming, coming, thousands strong, to the great convention soon upon us. Shall we come in shame or in the brightness of triumph, in the glow and exultation of victories won "in His name?"

GEORGE H. COMBS.

Lord Baltimore, Roger Williams and Religious Toleration.

DEAR BRO. GARRISON:—I notice in the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST of July 26th a letter from Bro. B. B. Tyler containing the following statement:

Lord Baltimore preceded Roger Williams in the founding of a free state. To Maryland and not to Rhode Island belongs the honor of being the first commonwealth in which religious freedom was guaranteed and enjoyed. Roger Williams was a Baptist for six months. Lord Baltimore was a Roman Catholic.

This statement in one form or another has been going the rounds at intervals ever since the days of Archbishop Hughes. I well remember when Cardinal Gibbons made it in Baltimore; it got into the papers, and the archives of the Maryland Historical Society being accessible the Cardinal, was so dealt with that he has not publicly made the same statement in Maryland since.

Some four years ago the same claim was made by one "Savoyard" in the columns of the Louisville Courier Journal, but when the "Maryland Toleration Act" itself was quoted to him he subsided and nothing has been heard from him since. The facts are as follows: A charter was granted by King Charles I., of England, to the second Lord Baltimore June 20, 1632 In 1634, with some 200 colonists, he founded St. Mary's. This colony was of the "proprietary" kind, being the first of its class on this continent. Lord Baltimore was "proprietor" and King Charles told him that all laws which he and his people passed which were not a violation of the charter should go into effect at once, without waiting for any "revision" by the crown. Of course, if they had passed laws violating the charter they would not only have been revised by the crown, but very promptly revoked. And so whatever "religious toleration" Lord Baltimore granted to the commonwealth of Maryland was "granted by reason of the stipulations, stated or implied, of a charter given him by the English king who (let it not be forgotten) was also the Protestant head of the Church of England! In that charter King Charles provided for the same kind and degree of "religious toleration" in America which he was at the time "granting" to his "subjects" in England; and precisely that much "religious toleration" did Lord Baltimore "grant" to the colony of Maryland, and no more. The charter did not require "religious freedom," and Lord Baltimore never granted "religious freedom." But before passing to the proof of this statement I call attention to the fact that whatever "religious toleration" (for it was absolutely that and nothing more, as I am prepared to prove,) Maryland had came, not primarily from the Roman Catholic Lord Baltimore, but from the Protestant Episcopalian King Charles I. Lord Bastimore had to act in harmony with the charter and the well-known wishes of the king that granted it or lose it, and is therefore entitled to no higher praise than he who acts because he knows if he don't act he will lose his job!

But now to the proof of that which I was speaking a moment ago; and here it is: The much-belauded Toleration Act of Maryland did decree that no believer in Jesus Christ should be molested on account of his religion, but it also decreed that all who denied the Trinity should be put to death. How is that for "religious freedom?" Will Bro. Tyler deny that the act was what I say it was? Hughes did not, Gibbons did not, Savoyard did not-at least after the words had been quoted to them. Bro. Tyler talks about "religious freedom" in Maryland! Why, that "Act" would have brought to the gallows every Unitarian, Jew and Socinian in the colony. It would have strangled or burned at the stake such men as Channing, Dewey, Holmes, Whittier, Longfellow, Lowell, Bayard Taylor, Robert Colyer, Peter Cooper, Stephen Girard, David Swing, Baron and Baroness Hirsch, Moses Montefiore, Tyndal, Huxley, Spencer, Darwin, Ridpath, Richard Anthony Proctor and the woman who wrote "Nearer, my God, to Thee!"

"Religious freedom" in Maryland! Why, there was simply no such thing. There was a certain limited "religious toleration," such as the Church of Rome and the Church of England have been pleased to "grant" at various times. But who wants or takes such a "grant?" Slaves, none else. Who makes such "grants?" Tyrants and monsters, and no others. I close this part of the subject by saying that I would like to see the proof of the proposition that "religious freedom" existed by law in Maryland before the year 1636, when Roger Williams founded the colony of Providence "as a shelter for persons distressed for conscience." Thus far it has not been produced, and we will wait to see what Bro. Tyler may bring forth.

And now a closing word concerning Roger Williams, against whom for some reason or other Bro. Tyler seems to have been greatly moved. He came to Boston in the year 1631, that is, one year before Charles I., signed the Maryland charter and three years before Lord Baltimore's emigrants landed at St. Mary's. He began at once preaching what he called "soul liberty" in Boston and Salem, boldly declaring to the people everywhere that God alone was Lord of the conscience, and that magistrates had no right to punish people except for civil offenses. He kept this up until 1635, when he fled from Salem in the winter to avoid a warrant which the pious council of Salem had issued ordering his arrest. Bro. Tyler says: "Roger Williams banished himself." These words are to be taken no doubt in a strictly 'Pickwickian serse." Yes, he "banished himself" just as the Jews banished themselves from Egypt, the Huguenots themselves from France, the Laracen Moors and Moriscoes themselves from Spain and as the Tarter trine, of whom De-Quincey tells us, which banished itself from the plains of the Volga to the great wall of China. Yes, Roger Williams did banish himself in that

Well, at any rate, he was rescued by the Indians and the next spring purchased land for the colony of "Providence." He did not buy of the English king, whom he said had no right to it, but of the Indians themselves. He founded Providence Colony without any charter telling what to do and what not to do and solemnly set the place apart as a refuge for all who were persecuted for conscience sake. Shortly after the beautiful Rhode Island was purchased by the Hutchinsons and Aspinwalls and others, and in 1644 it was united by charter with the colony which Williams had planted eight years before. Roger Williams was president of the united colonies from 1654 to 1657, and he died in Providence in the year 1683. He may have been "rantankerons," as Bro. Tyler mays, though I am sure I don't know what the word means. But as I read Bro. Tyler's parade of his alleged errors and foibles I could not help saying: "Now what was the use in giving such things to the public press, even if they are true?" Had other men no foibles? Had Simon Peter none? James none? Barnabas none? Wesley none? Campbell none? Well, every one to their taste about such things. I know this, however, that a writer who lived in Roger Williams' day speaks of him as "one of the most disinterested men that ever lived, a most pious and heavenly minded soul."

I also know that from the day he set foot in Boston until he died, fifty-four years after, he never wavered in his testimony against all union of church and state, and as the colony which he planted was the first on this continent to stand for "religious freedom" guaranteed by law, so it has always stood in the front rank among our liberty-living people. And it has stood here in times which tried men's souls. In 1643 Massachusetts, Connecticut, New Haven and Plymouth(!) entered into a defensive union to protect themselves against the Indian savages, but they would not let Rhode Island come in because she stood for "religious liberty;" and they would not let Maine come in because she had allowed an Episcoal Church to be built within her borders."

And so these two poor, weak colonies were left to defend them elves as best they could against the Indians. And by the way, the Plymouth which would not allow them to come in was the Plymouth of the Pilgrims, of whom Bro. Tyler says elsewhere in his letter: "The Pilgrims did not persecute; the Puritans did." James Vernon.

Virginia Letter.

We are working up in the southeastern district. Our convention closed August 3, and is declared by all to be the best in the history of our district. The churches were well represented, the delegates enthusiastic, the speakers all at their post and the program was carried out to the letter. Not a single hitch or note of discord was to be found in the whole three days' meeting. W. E. Powell, F. W. Berry, R. E. Withers, J. Preston Lewis, W. S. Bullard, of East Radford, and the writer were the preachers present and participating.

The convention was held at Mizpah Church in Dinwiddie County. This is a new church, the brethren having just completed their house of worship ir May. But they know how to entertain a convention. Their praise is upon the lips of all who attended. W. S. Bullard did most of the preaching, and to say it was done in a masterly way is to say the least. All were edified, the church strengthened by 25 additions and a great deal of prejudice removed. People came for 20 miles around to hear the simple Jerusalem gospel and carry away with them a better understanding of what the disciples believe and teach. Three months ago we only numbered 33 members; to-day our roll is 124. This is a phenomenal growth and only shows what can be done in many more of our rural districts if the proper steps are taken. I believe if the means were at hand to put an evangelist in this district for twelve months that half a dozen churches could be established. The brethren see this also and they are taking steps now to put a man in the field. Brethren, help your district board with both your prayers and your money and you will be surprised to see how the Lord will bless your efforts to spread the king-

My resignation of group No. 3 takes place September 30. It is not known who will be my successor as yet. But the group board is looking for a man and they want him at once. They don't want to miss a single month, and that is a capital idea. The writer is ready to accept a new work. Evangelistic work is preferred. J. Preston Lewis is moving the work in Petersburg. The convention goes there next year and we are confident if J. Preston stays there Petersburg will come to the front.

W. E. Powell's work in group No. 1 is showing up very nicely. F. W. Berry finds time to run a farm and preach for four churches. R. E. Withers is doing some evangelistic work on his own hook. He goes on the promises, and I must say if Virginia is evangelized we must have more of his kind in the state. We need more like John Smith, Barton Stone and others of the restoration days in this present age. Go preach is the marching order of our Lord, and we must obey. More anon.

A New Named Loan Fund.

The First Christian Church, Augusta, Ga., where A. B. Phillips is preaching, has just taken out a Named Loan Fund in Church Extension.

Bro. Phillips took charge of the church about a year and a half ago, and the congregation has had steady growth in all departments of work. In February of last year Bro. Phillips and his church nvited the s-cretary of Church Extension to visit them in the interests of that work. It was during this visit that Bro. Phillips and the First Church people decided that their annual offerings should be made large enough to take out a Named Loan Jund. Over $300 annually were secured in sub scriptions to run through a series of years until the full $5,000 is paid in. More than $300 has already been sent to the board this year and the Named Fund of the First Christian Church of Augusta, Ga, is now an established fact and will be reported at Kansas City this fall at the Nation-Convention. This is the fourth church to take out Named Funds, and the second one this year. It will be remembered that the First Church, Louisville, where E. L. Powell is pastor, took out a Named Fund last December. Frankfort, Ky., and Cedar Rapids, Ia., are the other two churches that have done the same in former years. There are many large churches in the land that could and ought to do the same. There is no better time than now, when the board is making an effort to reach the first quarter of a million.

When the Augusta people were planning to take out this Named Fund some of their good people were fearful that if the church did so well for Church Extension other mission funds might suffer. But let us see how it worked under the generalship of an all-round missionary man like A. B. Phillips. The first payment on the Named Fund was made in March. Immediately following that was the foreign offering and Augusta went $25 ahead of her apportionment. Later came the home offering, and Augusta again increased the apportionment by $15. The church has raised more than $800 for missions since June 1st and will do far more for state missions in Georgia than ever before.

In addition to this the church has spent over $1,070 on improvements in beautifying their building, and will yet pay out over $300 more for improvements this year. Who says it kills a church to have an endowment? The latent power of that church is coming to the rescue of all good work. They have raised this year, aside from the pastor's salary, over $3,500, the pastor's salary being provided for by endowment. The good people of Augusta are persuaded that they must give most liberally for missions in order that God may bless them. We are glad to give pictures of the pastor and the Augusta church building, accompanying this article. The people are very happy over what they have done. It might be well just here to explain the Named Loan Fund feature of Church Extension. A Named Loan Fund is $5,000, or more, to be paid at once or in annual installments through a series of ten years. Each fund so given is kept in an account by its-If, so that the donor or his friends may see its work going on from year to year. No part of the interest is used to pay current expenses, but is constantly applied to build up the fund.

Being loaned upon ample security, the Named Fund begins at once to grow by the multiplying power of interest compounded semiannually, for the mission pays its interest in semiannual installments. The main power of the Named Fund is, however, in its financial power of going and coming. Its perpetual motion is demostrated in this, that as fast as payments come back on loans they go out again. Starting out the $5 000 in loans to churches to be returned in annual installments regularly within five years, it can be demonstrated that, exclusive of the interest, the $5,000 will do the work of $12,442. During ten years, while Governor Drake was paying in $5,000 his Named Fund did the work of $11,745, building thirtythree churches.

Aside from the churches mentioned, the following have given or are giving Named Funds: F. M. Drake, Standard Publi hing Company, T. W. Phillips, Dr. J. W. Girl and Asa Shuler. What monument can man or woman erect more lasting than a Named Loan Fund? The world owes to Christianity the thought of making movements to help and bless mankind and not simply to please. Earthquakes, fire and vandal bands can never destroy the monument of a Named Loan Fund in Church Extension.

Le Roy, Pa.

DEAR BRO. GARRISON:—I regret to have to say that on account of ill health I am compelled to retire from the active work of the ministry. I do so reluctantly, but of necessity. About 45 of my 65 years of life have been devoted to the active ministerial work. It is a work I love and leave it with great regret. But I hope to recuperate, and if so, do yet more work for the blessed Master. Pray for me.

The church here is a good one. We part with reluctance, but must submit to the inevitable. We will relocate at Findlay, O. The church here will need a pastor. Correspondents can write to Bro. Leroy Holcomb, clerk, LeRoy, Pa.

R. H. BOLTON.

Will Reach the Mark.

The recent marked development of generosity among the Disciples of Christ is full of promise. Within two years so many goals in missionary enterpise have been passed that I find it easy to believe that the Church Extension Fund will pass the $250,000 mark before Sept. 30 of the present year.

Our endowment for church building must now enter upon a new era of popular favor. Church houses in many quarters trumpet its merits. The number of both the helped and the helpers has become large. The interest of all such has been secured. These give this enterprise its most favorable advertisement. Henceforth the size of the fund will be a helpful factor in promoting its own growth.

The work of our worthy secretary in securing gifts from individuals merits the gratitude of our people. The offering from the churches should be much larger. Here is the location of the pastor's privilege. The September offering must not be less than $20,000. If pastors and church officers approach their privilege in the matter of putting before the people in a hearty way the uses of this fund, the hopes of the Church Extension will not be disappointed.

M. J. GRABLE.

A Friend in Need.

Having had a large experience in raising money to provide for the payment of church debts, I am prepared to say that the matter of very liberal donations to the Church Extension Fund is of the very greatest importance. Recently, I knew of several valuable church buildings that would have been lost to our brotherhood had it not been for the timely assistance rendered by the Church Extension Society.

No church is considered by the community where it is located permanent until it has a house of worship where it can meet to keep the ordinances of the Lord's house.

If our churches could be made to realize that we have 2,700 church organizations without a house of worship and that with a small amount of help from the Extension Board nearly all of them would be able to provide a home that they could call their own, we are sure that the coming collection would be a most generous one.

We trust that our churches will give so generously that the 1,800 missions that have appealed to the board for help may not have appealed in vain.

State Mission Notes.

This is the time of the year when the secretary doth spread himself over the land trying to attend all the district and county conventions. We had four last week-Boone, Lincoln, Montgomery and Monroe. I could attend the first three and did. Boone and Lincoln had great conventions in the matter of attendance. The Montgomery convention at New Florence was growing in numbers when I was there and promised well. There must be more system in the holding of these conventions or it will be impossible for us to reach them all. I had a great Sunday, Aug. 12. Bro. S. G. Clay, secretary for Howard County, had arranged it for me, and but for his assistance I could not have done it. I preached in the morning at Fayette, afternoon at Mt. Morish and at night at Ashland. If that was not a hard day's work, tell me what was. But then it paid. Fayette's apportionment is $30; they raised $41.50. Mt. Moriah's is $10; they paid $1634. Ashland's, $20 and they provided for it, and the secretary was tired, grateful and happy. I find my brethren ready to give when they see the need, and I am more and more convinced that if the preacher will present the matter there will be response. I am sending out this week a transcript of my books from each county to the county secretary asking his attention to the delinquent churches and beseeching him to help us. So if you hear from him remember I did it.

Many people are asking me about the to Moberly. I can only say that I am at work on them and you will find something about it in the next week's papers. Have you sent in your name yet to S. B. Moore? Send it now. Indications are for a great convention. Study the program very carefully—it is in this issue—and you will find it is "one of the finest."

So many preachers write that they have called for collections for all the other mission interests and their people are a little tired, but they will do their best. Next year, brethren, try making your people tired after you have taken the state mission offering. If you have not raised the contribution, raise it now; only three weeks and the time will be gone. Act now. Yours in His name.

Missouri Bible-school Notes.

The school reports at various county meetings are much better than usual, especially in the manner of doing their work. We will soon have hundreds of graded schools in Missouri.

Middle Grove has missed but one year giving to this work since 1879, and when with them in July, this one year was also paid. C. H. Strawn is minister and Miss Letha Noel the efficient superintendent.

Had the pleasure of meeting with the Central (Moberly) brethren one night, hearing S. B. Moore who is so acceptable to the people, and of receiving one quarter of their apportionment to our work.

At the Callaway meeting many schools accepted their apportionments. Oak Grove paid the first quarter. Two new schools in the county since last report. More schools means more mission work for Christ and more work for human souls. Why not imitate Callaway?

At Auxvasse the changes for the better in school work are something remarkable; their patient listening indicated a determination to have the work better still if possible. Barnard Cowles, the railway agent is superintendent and W. G. Surber the efficient minister, and both are succeeding in their high calling.

J. W. Hulett did much for our work. A full day was given the Boone meeting at Harrisburg, hearing the good school reports and taking pledges of friends. You will hear definitely from Red Top school and church from now on.

New Florence, Polk, Columbus, Schell City, Glenwood and Two Mile send us good news as to their part in this work.

The Monroe County meeting at Pleasant Grove was held in their newly furnished house; it locked as bright as a pin. Steps were taken as will tell in mission work the coming year. Victor pays its first quarter promptly.

Two Mile, Montgomery, is where the Clares and Uncle Alex. Mudd are doing much for Christ.

Jno. W. Jacks at Montgomery and E. S. Dalton at Lilly are true colaborers, the former seeing to school apportionment, then giving personally. These are friends indeed, and their kindness helps over some of the rough places.

If you can, brethren, make ready for a big fall Bible-school rally; it pays. H. F. Davis.

Northern Illinois.

It has been my privilege, recently, to visit Northern Illinois and to gain a better knowledge of that field as one in which our people ought to be more interested. I was called to Milledgeville under the auspices of the State Board, to hold a meeting, but did not hold the meeting on account of local conditions which were practically antagonistic to the work for the time being. But this visit enabled me to see and learn much of the field. It is one of the most beautiful sections of the state, besides it is wealthy and prosperous. A strong church in any of the large towns in that region would mean much for our cause. That churches have not been established there is a surprise to those who know the field. The populations, as a rule, are intelligent, and if converted would make good workers for the Master's king-

We have only a few churches in all that district, and these are so isolated that they fail to gain the enthusiasm found in regions where churches are more numerous. At Sterling we have a good church. Bro. Silas Jones has been the efficient pastor there for about five years. But this church lacks enthusiasm and push. It could become strong and great, for it has some excellent material, men and women of culture and means. Then the local field at Sterling is first-class, having a population, including Rock Falls just across the river, of 10,000 or more. It is a manufacturing center, and its business will grow largely in the near future. I remained here several days so as to learn the field.

I stopped two or three days at Aurora, a city of 25,000, on Fox River, thirty-nine miles out from Chicago. Here we have no church, and never had Why such a city without one church a church. of our people in it? It has become a great business center, and is growing rapidly, and we have members going there every year who become practically lost to us as a people. No one knows how many members we have there at this time. But they have no one to lead them, no one to hold them together, no one to shepherd them. Aurora is a great field, but it cannot be worked successfully without a competent man being at the head who can give all his time to that work. This would mean money. Some one may ask: "Why does not the State Board take hold of it and build a church there?" The State Board would be glad to do this work, and do it speedily, but the brothren and churches of the state have not supplied the needed funds to carry on this work. If a half dozen churches and brethren would give the Board $100 each for two years, for this special work, the Board could undertake the work before the winter sets in. Have we not as many as six brethren in the state who will pledge $100 each per year for two years, that this work may be inaugurated? If so, let such address J. Fred Jones, Cor. Sec., Stanford, Ill. Who will respond? Let it be done at once.

The Mankato (Kan.) Church.

Mankato was a mission point a year ago and as it was the county seat our people felt the need of a church in the center of the county, so our little band, with the aid of the county, built a pretty little church. Our property is worth $2,500 and we are free from debt. In our darkest hour we called Sister Clara Hazlerigg, the great evangelist, to hold a protracted meeting and dedicate our church. She dedicated the church on the 21st of July and raised about $800 to finish paying for the building and furniture. Dedication day was truly a great day for us. The house was filled to everflowing and many were turned away. Nearly all our ministers in the county were present; we make special mention of Elder Philips, of Jewell City, and Elder Shipley, of Stockton. Because of the dry weather and failure of crops we had felt almost discouraged and we can think of no one else that could have raised our money but Sister Hazlerigg. After a five weeks, stay with us she left us with a church roll of 70 members; of these 17 came by confession and baptism, 10 from other religious peoples, from the Christian Church by letter and statement 43. Of the 33 only 14 had been members of the congregation that disbanded here something like three or four years ago. The others have mostly moved here from other places. Sister Hazlerigg has left us with a good Sundayschool, Christian Endeavor and midweek prayermeeting; also temporarily arranged for Elder Philips and his wife, of Jewell City, to fill the pulpit at Mankato. She also began the fund for a permanent pastor's salary and left it in the hands of a strong finance committee for completion, so in the near future we hope to call a pastor. We shall pray for a gifted consecrated man that is willing to come and accept the salary that we can give and make the work and the salary what it had ought to be. None but our brightest and best could fill this place. Last fall Sister Hazlerigg held a meeting at Randall with 35 additions and at Jewell City with 82 additions. She is called for all over Jewell county but goes to Ionia and that is the last meeting she can give Jewell County for a long time.

Sister Hazlerigg has left our work in harmonious condition with the members consecrated and greatly uplifted. Our prayers are that God may bless her wherever she may go.

The other churches of the town closed their services and attended our meetings. the first meeting of the kind ever held by the writer, and the result has given us intense satisfaction. The whole religious population seemed stirred to a high sense of religious duty. Men and women of every religious body in the town came to us manifesting high appreciation of the work done, any many expressed the determination to devote themselves more constantly and earnestly to the best of services. Would it not be well to have more such meetings? I believe they can be precursors to large ingatherings churches. What about some evangelistic work along this line? We were invited to other points in Georgia, but home duties forbade a longer stay. Bro. J. E. Speigel is the pastor at Sandersville. He belongs to a family of preachers and is a royal good fellow. The business men and others can see but little use in erecting another house when there are two in the town practically vacant. Three of these houses belong to three different branches of the Methodists. "May be I'm blind," but I'll frankly confess my inability to see any common sense in having three Methodist churches in a town of six naving three Methodist churches in a town of six or seven hundred people. Our people have tried to purchase one of the buildings. They won't sell. They won't rent. They won't use them themselves nor allow any one else to use them "Dog on hay." See? Farmington, Aug. 20.—Our new church building is under way. Hope to have it completed by winter. We spent a few evenings preaching for the Bonne Terre brethren last week. several added to the membership, a splendid hear-ing from the people of the town, the church again opened for Sunday-school and money raised for preaching once a month. We have a good, beautifully located church property there.—A. M HARRAL.

New Franklin, Aug. 20.—Bro. A. N. Lindsey has just closed the best meeting ever held in the history of this church, resulting in 48 additions, ranging in age from 14 to 74 years, among whom are some of the best families of the city. Bro. Lindsey is the most powerful preacher it has ever been our good for the present of the server to have seed his life is a living testimony to tune to hear, and his life is a living testimony to the power of Christ. He preached the gospel in its simplicity and purity and has fully demonstrated that the gospel (not visions and dreams) is the power of God in turning men from darkness to light and from the power of Satan unto God. The meeting has resulted in great good to the church, not only in enlarging its membership but has given it a power and prestige in this community that it never before occupied, which will enable it to go forward into larger fields of usefulness .- J. M. SETTLE.

Union Star, Aug. 20.-Last September I went, in response to the request of Bro. J. E. Dittmore, a former Missouri neighbor, to Elbert County, Colorado, where 12 days' preaching resulted in the baptism of 13 persons and the organization of a congregation of 22 at the James Schoolhouse, on what is known as "The Divide," between the Platte and the Arkansas Rivers, 50 miles from Denver and 30 miles from Colorado Springs. July 29, 1900. At their urgent request I returned to them and was rejoiced to find that nearly all had remained faithful and that they are doing a good work. Owing to the scarcity of preachers they had no regular preaching until some two months ago, when they secured the services of Bro. B. E Warren, who came to us from the M.E. Church (South) last December to preach for them twice a month. I was very favorably impressed with Bro. W. and the brethren say he is a good preacher. preached 25 sermons, which resulted in the addition of 16 persons; 10 by primary obedience, one from the Baptists, two reclaimed, three by statement. Promised, God willing, to return to them for another meeting next year.—W. A. CHAPMAN.

Nevada, Aug. 27.-The Rinehart Church celebrated its 26th anniversary yesterday The services commenced with a wedding and ended with a baptism. Large and enthusiastic audiences at all the services. Only five of the original members remain, all of whom were present to receive the hand of fellowship and congratulations of those present .- S. MAGEE.

High Point, Aug. 24.—Have just closed a five weeks' meeting at Union, 10 miles south of California. Results, 83 additions; of these, 51 were men and boys and 63 were by baptism. Bro G. W. Phillips is the pastor of the church and is a good yokefellow.—HAROLD E. MUNSON.

St. Louis, Aug. 27 .- In the absence of our minister, who has been away two Lord's days, the work still goes on. There was one addition yesterday, a man in middle life.—IRVING McGOWAN.

Darlington, Aug. 27.—Began meeting here Aug. 5th. We have good audiences; four raptized, Sunday, 26th inst. Meeting continues.—C. E.

"Suits Us all the Better."

BY M. LA FAY GESTRUE.

This story is about three girls. We know them and their families—the Brownlees, the Brunsteads and Burnsfolks—not the Burns.

Mamie Brownlee inherited five hundred dollars from her mother's estate and naturally was quite elated. As soon as she completed the village high school course she intended going away to school. She taught a term of three months in a country district before going, however, while getting possession of the estate. At the time of going "college" sounded greater than "university." But she went to the university—one of the most prominent ones in Illinois—in company with a banker's daughter, which elated her a little more. The banker's daughter is not important in this story if she was there would be a fourth B.

At the close of the school year Mamie Brownlee and Nelle Baker came home. They said good-bye to their numerous school friends with the expectation of meeting again in autumn.

Mamie was sure she would return with Nelle, even if she had exhausted all of her inheritance. Soon she began to talk to her sister Lora, who had inherited a like sum, but was not going to use it in going away to school. She was teaching and intended going to college on her own earnings. She said: "I have an ambition to see what I myself can make out of myself." She said those exact words so many times that they were often quoted facetiously by her friends. To the suprise of every one she loaned her sister one hundred and fifty dollars.

"By judicious management that will take any one to school a year," said Lora.

Mamie said: "Yes, I met pupils who had even less per year, but I regarded them as quite inferior. They did not move in my circle at all." She was confident she could get enough more to keep up "a respectable appearance," but she did not, and consequently, went to another school, where she had no acquaintances and could start in on a simpler scale. The fact is, she squandered her money the first year by giving elaborate banquets, getting up excursions and making herself the belle. "Society" was her treasure.

Pearl Brunstead had no home of her own, inherited no money, and had lived with an aunt when not serving by the day. She was most attractive, fastidious manners and loved dress. She could not earn enough to dress herself as she desired and thought she would do something else more profitable, if possible.

Her aunt had taught school, which put Pearl in the notion. Every one knew Pearl's aunt was a school-teacher, "had taught school," for on the slightest opportunity on almost any occasion she would refer to "when I was teaching," or if she spoke with authority she would emphasize "I used to be a school teacher," or "when I was a public school-teacher I learned" so and so, until it became very monotonous to all, especially to the present-day teacher. Pearl's aunt taught in early days in a new country when almost any one could teach, so little was required, and she never progressed further than a third-grade certificate. Hence her many personal references were amusing, and often excused on the ground that in her estimation there was very little the teacher did not know, her own peculiar weakness.

Pearl thought to be a school-teacher was to be somebody, and succeeded in borrowing a certain sum of money from a friend, who commiserated her condition, in order to attend a normal school. By dint of a year's hard study she was able to secure a certificate.

She was like Mamie in point of extravagance, but circumstances alter cases. No splurge was attempted by her at school; she looked forward to the time when she could "cut a swath." The tastes and opinions of these young ladies were so similar that they were congenial friends. Mamie was hunting a school, too. Both were confident of success, both h d "been away to school," which was sufficient recommendation for anybody. It never occurred to them that most school boards preferred common-sense school teachers, for "as is the teacher so is the school," generally.

Mamie, having taught, was Pearl's guide in the application business. First, she applied for a position for herself in the town where she lived; also in the nearest country district. She told Pearl to apply for the Bailey school and give her the application to present on account of "prestige." Pearl was not aware that this was the very school for which Mamie had made application.

The town school board soon notified Mamie that her application was rejected; "not competent" was the reason given. Thinking she might not get the town school she had held her friend's application and concocted a very plausible story as to the silence of the Bailey school board, which was satisfactory to Pearl.

It was soon known that Mamie Brownlee had secured the Bailey school. This surprised Pearl and she asked Mamie about it, who told her that "in presenting the application the board asked me to take the school myself. I could hardly resist such a direct compliment on account of one of my society friends having married a gentleman who is the wealthiest farmer in the district and a member of the school board."

This satisfied Pearl. But the truth of the matter was simply this: The board never received Pearl's application at all, and Mamie's society friend had persuaded her husband to influence the board to accept Mamie's application. Mamie was a false friend and Pearl was so disposed to "toady" after even the appearances of vanity that not a suspicion crossed her mind as to the actual truth.

Pearl wondered what she would do. Mamie felt ashamed of her unprincipled action and named a day when they would go into the country to hunt for a school. So she secured her father's horse and buggy and started off with Pearl. They drove directly to the Morgan district. Mr. Morgan lived nearest the schoolhouse. Most people had formed the habit of calling school districts by the names of persons on whose land the schoolhouse was originally built. Very often the name of a pioneer was perpetuated in this way.

Mamie's father was acquainted with Mr. Morgan. She soon made known this fact and introduced her friend who desired to teach in his district.

It happened that Robert Shirley, the clerk of the board, was at Mr. Morgan's, sharpening his scythe on his neighbor's grindstone. That is good luck; director and clerk could both be seen, a majority of the board. Soon after Mr. Shirley was introduced he laughingly remarked: "You town girls seem to have an eye on our school."

"Yes," said Mamie, "it is an ideal place."
And Pearl: "It is so artistically situated, beautiful woods and flowing stream. I should love to live here always."

Pearl handed Mr. Morgan her recommendations, which consisted of one from the president of the bank, who had never taught a day in his life and never would; one from a popular lawyer and real estate man, who would write a complimentary letter for any pretty girl; one from the professor of the normal department, where she had attended school, and her certificate. All very good.

After reading them over Mr. Shirley said: "There's another young lady applicant from your town. She's ahead of you in applying; is recommended by the county superintendent and Mr. Kidder, of your town."

"So you have let the school?" said Mamie.
"No, we have not," replied Mr. Morgan.
"We usually take a little time."

Both girls were quaking. Having a recommendation from the county superintendent and Mr. Kidder, too, was pretty good. And first with her application. The superintendent's influence was especially important, and Mr. Kidder was quite a school man.

Finally, Pearl ventured to inquire: "Who is the young lady applicant?"

Mr. Thirley promptly replied: "Miss Ethel Burns."

At this both girls laughed heartily, and Mamie said: "Why, she's our kitchen girl!" and the laugh was ridiculing.

But listen! Mr. Morgan spoke: "Very well, if she knows enough to cook as well as teach school, she suits us all the better."

Mr. Shirley: "That's my opinion, too."
Mr. Morgan: "Then, Miss Ethel Burns has the school."

With a supercilious air Mamie said: "For a' that," thinking such a poetical reference would conciliate matters and give the impression that she was satisfied.

But said Mr. Morgan: "No, not 'for a' that,' which of itself implies a distinction."

The girls drove on to the county seat, Mamie being determined to turn Pearl over to the mercies of the superintendent, who finally secured her a school.

The board were not favorably impressed with Ethel Burns, and regarded Mr. Kidder's recommendation as purely charitable, but Mamie's speech made them willing to depend on the superintendent's recommendation alone. Ethel taught the school and gave as good satisfaction as either of the other girls in their respective districts.

There are inferior servants in all branches of work, including the schoolroom and kitchen, but no where does it pay to be "holier than thou."

The Mamie Brownlees are not fair criterions of college work, and the student who improves his opportunities need not worry as to the people being able to discriminate.

Rome.

JOHN G. M. LUTTENBERGER.

We are now in the capital of Italy and the seat of popery. No one has an idea what Romanism means until they visit Rome, see a high mass at St. Peter's on Lord's day and notice the devotion of the cardinals and other religious officials and the superstitious kissing of the big toe of the bronze figure of the notable apostle who, if alive, would be astonished to find the church had drifted so far from the teaching of Christ Rome only has 40,000 priests, 20,000 nuns, 1,867 churches and about 16,000 beggars and paupers of different descriptions. When visiting St. Paul's Church, his tomb and that of Timothy, the Marmertine Prison, St. Peter's and the Vatican, with all their beauty and cost, their inhabitants, guarded by a regiment of soldiers and think of the noble Nazarene, who had nowhere to lay his head, I am not surprised at the decline of Romanism in Rome. No wonder that Martin, Luther, Wesley, Knox and Campbell were forced to cry out against such formalism. Infidels are made through such form of worship. Time forbids me to write more at present. We have visited the Catacombs and most places of interest.

A Good Chance for Some One.

There is always a good chance for the preacher who is ready. Many a man could add a third to his salary and make his work a half more effective by taking a thorough course with Prof. Ott in the Drake University College of Oratory at Des Moines, Ia.

The Faith of God.

O. R. PALMER.

Give us, O Lord, a faith like one Who, with her flowing tears did wash Thy feet, and from the weight of sin And guilt, and all its bondage free, She went in peace.

Give us a faith inspired of thee,
That works or patient waits, and does
Not doubt nor waver. Wrought in a life
At one with God. That mountains may Remove, or willing to be spent
In silent, humble ministry;
A lif- of prayer, of praise to thee;
A service free from fear and doubt,
From haste and waste and wrong.

Give us a faith that perseveres And brings the answer back for poor And needful ones; although the door Is shut, and thou dost not at first Intend to rise at our request.

Give us a faith that on thy Word
Relies and counts the promise sure,
E'en when the harvests fail. No flock
Is in the fields, no herd within
The stalls. A faith which like the man
Of God will send the servant out
To look for rain, when in the sky
Above and on the earth below
There is no sign. A man was he
Of passions like ourselves, yet he Did pray to thee and thou didst hear and answer.

Give us a faith that knows full well
That when with bodies racked with pain
On beds with anguish tossed, the arm
Of flesh has failed, thou art the same
As when the suffering woman through
The throng did press to touch thy robe
And was made whole. We know that from Thy side there flows a balm for ills
Of life when faith but touches thee,
And for our friends, that love may bring
Through crowds or through the roof, 'mid jeers
Or scorning unbelief, to lay
Them at thy feet.

But while, our Lord, we pray and wait For greater faith, we will not neglect What thou hast given. Relying on Thy promise sure, and counting on Thy grace for more, we'll meet the need About us. The lost and wandering ones Need Christ to save. In darkness grope The heathen. There's not a cry of faith—Real faith—by loving child of thine In Jesus' name but what will bring a blessing. 2333 N. Laying Aside Weights.

J. H. RYAN.

In the race which every Christian runs there should be a twofold object: first, to perfect his own life in Christ Jesus, and second, to lead others to and build them up in Christ. Any end less than this is unworthy of a Christian. In the accomplishment of this object there will be things to do and things to refrain from doing. What is the rule by which we are to decide what not to do? The writer of the Hebrew letter sums it up in the words "laying aside every weight, and the sin While which doth so easily beset us." there are a few who call themselves Christians, who desire to drag their pet sins to heaven with them, most of us are ready to put away the sin, and pray God earnestly to help us to do so. But how about the weights. Are we ready to lay them aside? There is a sharp distinction draws in this passage between things sinful, and those not so in themselves. Of course, things sinful are weights, and should be laid aside fer the double reason. But there are many things which are to be laid aside simply because they ARE weights. When a boy I pulled off my coat, shoes and socks and threw aside my cap when I entered a race to which I was challenged. Not that they were not good things, but simply because they were weights which interfered with that race. So, in the race of the Christian, the criterion by which matters in themselves not sinful are to be decided is whether they help or hinder in the race. Here is a business inviting me to enter. I may not simply ask, Is it profitable? but I must also question its probable effect upon me as a Christian, and as my influence in the community to lead men to Christ. Here is what I consider an innocent amusement. Shall I indulge? The first question to be settled is as to its effect upon my life and services in Christ. I can have as much influence in the community to win souls as I could if I did not. For instance, can I teach my Sunday-school class with as much enthusiasm and say as seriously, Be ye followers of me as I am of Christ as heartily as if I did not indulge? Recently I asked a church member to do a certain work, and she asked to be excused on the ground that certain amusements in which she engaged made it inappropriate for her to do so. Could there be a more complete condemnation of these amusements? And it does not much matter whether those who condemn the amusements are bigoted or liberal, whether the amusement is really harmful or innocent. If it is of such a character that in the community in which the person lives it hinders that one from doing his best work for Christ it is a weight, and the only thing to do is to lay it aside.

A man may say that an occasional dram of whisky does him no harm, but if that prevents him from being recognized in the community as a suitable person to lead a prayer-meeting, the weight should be laid aside. A certain business may be strictly honest, but on its face have such an appearance of evil that a man will not in the future stand well with them without as to the reputation of honesty. The indulging in the business method is such a weight that he cannot afford to assume it, or if he does he should at once lay it aside. In short, whavever is a weight, whether sinful or not, whatever hinders us in in living the Christ-life, or in leading others to do so, should be at once laid aside. It is the only sure way to win in the race.

Summer Religion.

A beautiful instance of Christian integrity is given of a distinguished Christian lady who was spending a few weeks at a hotel at Long Branch.

An attempt was made to induce her to attend a dance in order that the affair might have the prestige bestowed by her presence, as she stood high in society. She declined all the importunities of her friends.

Finally, an honorable senator tried to persuade her to attend, saying, "Miss Bthis is quite a harmless affair, and we want the exceptional honor of your presence."

"Senator," said the lady, "I cannot do it; I am a Christian. I never do anything in my summer vacation, or wherever I go, that will injure the influence I have over the girls of my Sunday-school class."

The senstor bowed, and said: "I honor you: if there were more Christians like you, more men like myself would become Christians .-All Aboard.

The Chinese Railway System.

From the exaggerated accounts of Chinese progress which we hear in the United States, the newly arrived American expects to travel from one end of the empire to the other with the convenience and luxury to which he has become accustomed at home. There are many new maps that make a creditable showing of railway lines, and i is something of a shock to learn that for the most part they have been surveyed, and aside from this, upon most of them not a stroke of work has been done. In the whole great empire with its 2,000 miles of coast line, and its area of more than 1,000,000 square miles there were in November, 1899, but 439 miles of completed railway. The most important -that from Tien-Tsin to the capital-has been in operation but two years.

When one inquires in San Francisco as to the most convenient route to Pekin, it is well to know that the encouraging statement "you can go by rail to the city gate" should be very freely interpreted. It is the truth, but not the whole truth. Leaving the comfortable mail steamers that ply between Hongkong and San Francisco at Shanghai, you have still before you a voyage of four days and four nights; and this not over the calm Pacific, but across the Yellow Sea, lashed with typhoons from July to September, and as rough as five hundred miles of continuous English Channel at intervals during the remainder of the year. From the first of December until March navigation is closed altogether and the belated traveler who has not left Pekin before the coastwise steamers are laid off, finds himself a prisoner there, or able to reach the south only by cart or litter-a slow, expensive and painful mode of traveling, even in favorable weather. It necessitates an enforced patronage of Chinese wayside inns, which are freezing cold, dark and badly ventilated and swarming with every species of vermin that prey upon the human being. Therefore, when one goes to Pekin by rail it really means that five hundred miles of the journey, taking Shanghai for the starting-point, are made by steamer; twenty miles by one short line from Tong-ku on the north bank of the Pei-he River and then by rail from Tien-Tsin to Pekin. But here there is another disappointment in store for the unenlightened; the station at the terminus is not within but without the walls, and from here to the gate of the Chinese city-the outer circle of the fourfold capital-the distance is traversed either by electric cars or by jinrikisha-both innovations of very recent date. From the terminus of the electric line to the hotal, within the second wall, in the Tartar city, one may proceed by jinrikisha, on the back of a donkey, by mule litter, if one can be obtained, or, as a last resort, by a Pekin cart. This vehicle is not recommended to the unseasoned, or to one who has not time subsequently to nurse his bruises and contusions. The vehicle is sort of abbreviated dray, the tires of th heavy wheels five inches in width, the cov ered bed resting solidly on the heavy axle trees with nothing to break the appalling jar when the wheels drop into ruts three feet deep, or go crunching over stones that would wrench an ordinary cart to pieces .-From "By Rail to Pekin," by Mary H Krout, in the Chautauquan for August.

The Acme.... Smelting and Refining Company

Offers to Investors for a Short Time Unequaled Advantages.

IT IS A WELL-KNOWN FACT

That a custom smelter, properly equipped and operated, is the most certain source of revenue in the mining business.

Is not contingent upon the output of any one mine or group of mines, but draws its support from a large number of mines in the district where it is iccated. There are 100 producing and paying mines within convenient distance of our smelter site and at least 200 more would be developed if there was a custom smelter conveniently located to which ore could be shipped for treatment.

A CUSTOM SMELTER

Bears the same relation to mining that a grist mill does to an agricultural district, with the profits greatly in favor of a custom smelter. The usual net profits of a custom smelter are about $3.00 per ton.

WE HAVE GIVEN YEARS

Of careful study to our plans and know that we are warranted in our undertaking-the erection of a custom smelting plant. Risks which exist in all ordinary mining operations have been carefully eliminated from our plans. We have water, fluxes, an inexhaustible supply of ore and a clear field.

WE CONTRACT NO DEBTS. OUR MOTTO IS: CASH or NOTHING.

A CUSTOM SMELTER HAS THESE ADVANTAGES OVER ALL KINDS OF COMMERCIAL BUSINESS:

- 1. The product of a smelter invariably sells for cash.
- The ore smelted is ample security for the expense of smelting.
- Profits are always large, often reaching 50 per cent. annually on the par value of the stock.
- Charges for smelting are always collected before the "matte" or refined ore is delivered from the 4. smelter.
 - 5. A custom smelter has no bad debts.
 - 6. A gold smelter's out-put never fluctuates in value.
- A gold smelter is absolutely independent of any financial stringency, business stagnation, political disturbance, or other calamity which jeopardizes all ordinary classes of investments.

Our Board of Directors is a Guarantee of Safety to all Investors. -It is composed of

HON. C. C. COLE, Late Chief Justice of Iowa

HON. WEBSTER STREET, Chief Justice of Arizona

HON. EMIL GANZ, President of the National Bank of Arizona. H. M. CHAPMAN. Secretary of Phoenix and Maricopa County Board of Trade.

CALVIN OGBURN, Evangelist.

T. T. POWERS, LL.B.

AMONG OUR STOCKHOLDERS are U.S. Senators and Members of Congress, Ex-Governors, High Nava Officers, College Presidents.

When investing in the stock of the Acme Smeiting and Refining Company.

1. All the conditions are favorable for the erection and operation of a custom smelter.

2. The Board of Directors are all men of high moral and business standing.

3. The officers are all required to furnish bond.

The par value of the stock is $1.00 per share.

For a short time were accounted.

For a short time we are offering a limited amount of stock at 50 cents a share—one-half payable is sh, and balance in five equal monthly installments, or where the entire amount is paid in one payment cents a share. Stock is issued full paid and non-assessable. Most respectfully, Hancock (1st); Madge Masters (6th); Eugene Jameson; Florence Belle Beattie and her auntie.

Next week, young people-please give me your attention a moment-next week a new continued story begins in this department. It is a splendid story which I have written all by myself. It is about children-sure enough, live, every-day children. They seemed to me so real while I was writing about them that I could almost hear them breathe. This is a very long story. It will last as long as a whole year, so be sure and get the first of it. There is a mystery in it and adventures and piles and stacks of conversation and lots of things to laugh at. If it seems to break off sudden each week, remember that I haven't room on this page to clap in a whole chapter; we have to take each chapter to pieces just like you do a piano before you can get it through the door. Once a month we will print letters from our Advance Society; at other times we will have the story, which is entitled "Pete." There are three Morris girls in the story, Jennie, Madge and Prudence; and Madge has an intimate friend named Linda May Dudley, and Prudence has an intimate friend Letitia Pendleton. Jennie is 18, Madge and Linda May are 13 and 12, while Prudence and Letitia are 10 apiece. There are boys also who act just as boys in real life act, and there is a grown young man who is not very tiresome, and two tramps and a dog and a stray cat and good things to eat. I wish I could tell you how good this story is, but it would take more than this page (in fine print) to do it justice I don't think the name of it is as fine as it might be. Pete! Whoever heard of a book with such a name! I'll tell you what. As you read the story along, if a better name than that occurs to you write it to me and may be I'll change the title.

THE GOOD SAMARITAN.*

There is a large section of the Gospel of Luke that is not paralleled by the other evangelists. From chapter 9:51 to 18:14 there is little that is common to the various Gospels. We are indebted to Luke for much of the narrative of Jesus' ministry during these last few months of his earthly life. Our debt is vastly augmented when we remember that in this part of the history of our Savior occur the parables of the Good Samaritan, the Prodigal Son, the Rich Man and Lazarus and the Pharisee and the Publican. How much we would have lost if Luke had passed over in silence this part of our Lord's ministry.

The present parable was spoken in answer to a question asked the Mas er by a ertain la yer. Lawyers are good hands at asking quastions, and they like to show their skill by entangling poor witnesses in the meshes of their examinations. This lawyer had such a design upon the Master, for we read that he was "tempting" or trying him. Had he asked with serious and honest purpose the question: "What shall I do to inherit eternal life?" our Savior would doubtless have helped his feet into the way of life without delay. Jesus read his heart and determined to rebuke his insincerity. He therefore answered: "What is written in the law? how readest thou?" perhaps pointing as he spoke to the phylactery bound on the lawyer's forehead, which contained a strip of parchment bearing the very words of the "two greater commandments." The lawyer could not do otherwise than quote the well-known w rds: "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all hy heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy strength, and with all thy mind; and thy neighbor as thyself." Jesus replied: "Thou has answered right: this do, and thou shalt live." There can be no duty resting upon man that is not included in this all-prevailing principle. To love God supremely and our fellowman as ourselves must ever comprise the essence of all true religion. Had this lawyer understood and honestly practiced this sublime injunction he would have been in the way of salvation and able to lead others in it likewise.

But his question had not been for information. that he might better pursue the way of duty. It had been for disputation, that he might throw difficulties in the way of the divine Teacher and keep the people from believing in him. Hence, when the Master gives this plain and scriptural answer the lawyer feels in his heart that he stands selfcondemned. He knows well that he has not loved God with all his heart, nor his neighbor as himself. At least, not unless he can so narrow the term neighbor as to make it include only his nearest and most partial friends. Desiring, therefore, to justify himself, he asks: "And who is my neighbor?" Why need he justify himself? Who has accused him? Not Jesus, who accepts his reply to the question, What is written in the law? without controversy. Not the multitude. who look upon this teacher of the law as holy. His own conscience is his accuser, and its indictment is so severe that he cannot rest under it without an effort to prove his innocence. Jesus will have him answer his own question again, and he therefore tells the graphic story of the Good Samaritan.

Samartan.

The road that leads down from Jerusalem to Jericho is to-day, as it has ever been, a wild and dangercus way. Through the rugged hills and jagged rocks it winds; the desolateness unrelieved by a single city or village and with scarcely a human habitation along its whole course. Dark ravines open on either hand and many gloomy caves stretch their fearful mouths to frighten the lonely traveler. Robbers have ever, as is still the case, infested this descending ro d and pilgrims in Palestine hesitate to undertake this short journey without the protection of Turkish soldiers or the company of an Arab sheik. The pass of Adummim has long been known as "The Way of Blood," from the many deeds of darkness done by robbers there. A certain man journeying along this way was set upon by robbers, who took not only his money, but even his clothes, and left him bleeding and almost dead by the wayside. Soon after there came a priest that was on his regular trip, perhaps, from Jerusalem to his home in Jericho, where a great company of priests had their dwelling. He had been serving his turn in the temple service, or else was on his way thither. He saw the poor victim of the robbers but hastened on his way, not stopping to see how badly he was hurt. He feared, perhaps, that the robbers might be still in the vicinity and dreaded lest they might do him violence. Or if he recognized the unfortunate and even felt the sentiment of pity he may have reasoned that he had no way to take care of him, and that somebody else would come along who could better supply his wants. A little later a Levite came that way. He, too, had been assisting in the temple service, or was on his way to Jerusalem for that purpose. But the holy ministry to which he was dedicated had not nourished love in his heart and he also passed on his way, but not until he had come up to the poor fellow and look d on him, as he lay weltering in his blood. Had this poor fellow, who was doubtless a Jaw, depe ded on his own brethren for aid he would have died where he lay. But a certain Samarita, who was on a journey came al ng, and when he saw the poor wretch lying by the roadside he stopped and gave him the most tender and loving care. Pity stirred in his bosom, and throwing to the winds every excuse that might have justified him in going his way with the priest and Levite, he made himself the brother of the poor sufferer. Dressing his wounds as best he could he lifted him upon the beast he had been riding and walked beside him to the inn that stood by the roadside further along. He cared for him there all night, and when the morning came and he must resume his journey he paid the landlord two days' wages for the keeping of the wounded man and made arrangements for his care until fully recovered. Only divine love in his heart could have brought such service from the hands of this Samari an. That love was stronger than his fear of the robbers, than the instinct of self-preservation, than his race prejudice, than his love of money, than his zeal for the business on which he was making his journey. He could spare time, money and strength in service of this poor sufferer, and even peril his life for his sake.

Now, said Jesus, who was neighbor to him that fell among thieves? The question is changed. It is not, as the lawyer put it, Who is my neighbor? but, Am I neighborly? Jesus had not attended the schools of the law, but he had learned in the school of heavenly truth to know his neighbor and to be a neighbor to every man. He knew that need and plenty make men neighbors. Nations are neighbors, just as one can supply the other's lack. Christ is making commerce to draw the races closer together. "We that are strong ought to bear the infirmities of the weak." The whole earth is but one neighborhood, for every one either lacks that which another must supply, or has that which the other lacks.

True to his innate selfishness and self righteousness, the lawyer refuses to answer Jesus' question direct. He will not say he hated the word "Samaritan." So he goes around the longest way and reluctantly answers: "He that showed mercy on him." Why is it that we are so loth to acknowledge worth in one of another country, or religion, or blood? Why could not this Jewish lawyer see the beauty and divineness in this act of the good Samaritan? Why was it not as blessed in his sight as if done by a Jew? Why do we witness a like unwillingness to recognize the good deeds of men of other blood and speech to-day? Why cannot we see and confess that virtue is lovely when it exists in the life of a Chinaman or a native of India, as may be witnessed in countless instances among the native converts of our missionaries? Yet, there are many to whom a Chinaman is a Chinaman and nothing more; and it is nothing rare in these troublous times to hear men whose lives are sheltered under the canopy of our Christian civilization, which we owe to the foreign missionaries, who brought our fathers from naked savagery to their high estate of virtue and happiness, expressing the wish that the whole nation of the Celestial Empire might be swept from the face of the earth. We have yet much to learn from this despised Samaritan before we will have translated into our thought and conduct the law of love to God and our neighbor. To each of us, as to the lawyer with whom he had been talking, the Master may well say: "Go thou and do likewise."

TOPIC FOR SEPT. 9.

OUR SIMPLE DUTY.

(Luke 17:7-10)

There are many of us not willing to do our simple duty. We wish to do more, and in the effort to do more we fail of the duty itself. The simple duty is often the hard one to do. "Our reasonable service," as Paul puts it, is the irksome service, the steady, monotonous, dreary service, but the important service to perform.

And yet, if we take the right view of it all, there is a joy in the service. To serve a noble master, to wait upon his wants when he comes from the field of toil, is a joy to the devoted servant. How many a humble slave there once was at the South, whose delight it was to stend b hind "Massa's" chair at table and await his b-ck; how many a hereditary house servant in Old England, whose devotion to the lord of the soil was a joy to both.

So ought it to be with us in our service of our Master-it should be a joy to us, and in turn a joy to him. The simple duty of service, each in his own way, is the joy of life and the joy of the kingdom. Nor is there any whose service is rejected.

The blind Milton, in that so pathetic sonnet, speaks the story of devoted duty:

"When I consider how my light is spent, Ere half my life in this dark world and wide, And that one tal nt, which is death to hide, Lodged with me uselese; though my soul more bent To serve therewith my Mater and present count lest he, returning, chide. My tru 'Doth God exact da labor light deni-d? I fond y ask But path noe, to prevent That murmer . . soon replied:
'They also serve who only stand and wait.'"

There are many others, doubtless, who in one way or another have asked the same impatient question-Why is my life spared? Of what use am I? I can do nothing. Then is it time for such a one to arise, gird himself and stand waiting. Though no important service be immediately assigned to him, it is his plain duty to stand and wait.

Some there are inclined to complain, saving: "Christianity has never benefited me to speak of. Membership in the church or the Endeavor Society has never brought me the returns, spiritual or otherwise, that I thought it ought."

Is that the proper attitude? Shall we ask why our Master does not first sit down and serve us? It is ours first to serve him, blindly, unselfishly, demanding no immediate return; but trusting that the compensation shall be sure.

For each of us there is a duty that is plain. Is there any one thing that we are most capable of doing? That is our simple duty. There is a marvelous diversity of service in this world to be performed. Each of us is good for some one thing, and that thing we ought to do as unto the Lord. Kipling, in one of his semi humorous poems, speaks of the dissatisfaction with which, in the other world, the sailor-folk, walk the streets of gold, missing their ocean, and finally cry aloud:
"Take back your golden fiddles and we'll beat to open sea!

The poet adds:

"Then the Lord . . called the good sea up to him, And 'stablished its boundaries unto all eternity, And the ships shall go abroad to the glo y of the Lord.

Who heard the silly sailor-folk and gave them back their sea.

This is the sort of opportunity that shall be given us in the next world—nay, is given us in this—to do that thing which we are best fitted to That thing is our simple duty and our supreme joy.

Book Notes

All through the sultry month of August, ordinarily the dullest month of the year in the book trade, we have been kept busy filling orders. Our business has been much better than during the corresponding season in any previous year. There are two reasons for this: First, our people are becoming more and more a book reading people, and, second, we are offering better books at more attractive prices than ever before.

A book of which we have printed and sold thousands of copies is "The Christian Helper," by J. H. Foy. It is a book for preachers and church officers, and is the most valuable and complete manual ever published for such use. It contains hints, helps and instructions for every phase of the minister's work, sermon outlines for special occasions, forms for marriage ceremonies and funerals, programs for dedicatory exercises, instruction concerning the organization and work of the official board, etc., etc. It is a neat, clothbound volume, sent postpaid for 75 cents.

The interest of the civilized world has been centered for months on China. The people of America are interested in China as never before. They are eagerly reading all obtainable literature on China and the Chinese. The best little book about China is "Facts About China," by Wm. Remfry Hunt, of Cha Cheo. Mr. Hunt did not write a book to air any theories about the "Eastern Question," or to tell entertaining anecdotes illustrating the guile of the wily Mongolian. His work is very accurately described in its title-"Facts About China." He has compressed a great deal of information in very small space. The book, paper covers, sent postpaid for 25 cents.

We have not been saying much about "Christian Science Dissected" for several weeks, but the sale of that booklet goes merrily on. The first edition is practically exhausted, and we are preparing a second. The reader of this work is pretty certain to do four things: He will marvel greatly that such a stupendous fraud as Christian Science can flourish in this enlightened age; he will agree with the author in naming Mrs. Eddy the biggest charlatan of the century; he will enjoy a number of hearty laughs at the humor of the book, and he will advise his friends to procure and read a copy of the work. The book is sent, postpaid, for 25

If you are purchasing new song books for your church or Sunday-school you must in justice to yourself not give your order until you have care fully examined "The Gospel Call," "Silver and Gold" and "Tidings of Salvation" The monthly sales of these books is numbered by tens of thousands. Their superiority is evidenced by their popularity. We gladly send sample pages, pricelist, etc., on application.

Sarah M. Hickman, widow of the late Benjamin F. Hickman, was born in Staffordshire, England, in 1840, and in 1848 with her parents came to the United States. She became obedient to Christ in 1855, during a meeting in Hannibal, Mo., just entering her fifteenth year and has ever since just entering her fifteenth year and has ever since ived as became a follower of the Nazarene. The subject of this sketch was married to B. F. Hickman November 23, 1858, by whom six children were born, of whom J. T. S. Hickman, cashier of the Monroe City Bank, is the only son. Four children and a sister survive her. She moved to Monroe City in 1872, living there to the day of her death, Aug. 15, 1900, when falling asleep in Christ our sister-friend has gone to her husband and loved ones on high. "Blessed are the dead who die in the Lord."

Last Sunday was a very sad day in Jamestown, ind. At nine o'clock, just as the first bell was ringing for Sunday-school, the sweet spirit of our secretary, Bertha Kelley, left the earthly house and took on the heavenly. She was 18 years old and was to have been married just one month bence from the day she was buried. She was as bence from the day she was buried. She was as faithful to her duties as any one I ever knew. She was never absent from the house of God and the place of prayer. She was a good singer and together with her sister would sing duets for us and we all loved to hear them sing. We all miss her bright smiles and encourazing words. We all loved her fondly and her place cannot be filled by any other. We preached her funeral from the text, "They took up the body, buried it and went and told Jesus," to a great crowd.

The good wife was inconsolable and homesick for his company and yearned to depart and be with him, so that she literally pined away. She was one of the choicest spirits of the church, true and tried and triumphant in the possession of a worthy Christian life. For nearly 50 years she walked with her good husband, a helpmeet indeed, a queenly royal companion, loving everybody and beloved by everybody. Her remains were brought back to the home in this city. Her funeral services were conducted by the pastor of the Central Church at the home of her only daughter, which had been for five years the joint home of the two families. Alexander Campbell's Theology.

This is a neat book of very considerable inter est by Winfred Ernest Garrison. Like all the productions of the author, its English is without fault. The style is flowing, not to say florid. It has a great topic, and yet does not become burdensome to the weary brain. One who feels that he has not the strength necessary to study a work of this kind will be pleased with this book. It does not propose to wrestle with logical or theological propositions; it simply recites the historical setting and then outlines the conclusions reached by one of the great thinkers of the nineteenth century. Of course, it is not meant that Mr. Campbell ever presented the world with a systematized theology. The nearest known under such a view is what may be read from the Christian System, where he announces some leading truths as the conclusions which had become his

The conditions and influences leading up to the restoration movement by Mr. Campbell, Thomas Cam; bell, Walter Scott and others, take up about half the space. Were I in a critical mood I should say that it would have been better to have written wholly on the subject announced. Just how Alexander Campbell came to certain views of psychology are a little uncertain, and of far less interest to the average reader than would have been a strict detail of all the questions which troubled him in his religious investigations. Mr. Campbeli's views were based, as he supposed, not on any opposition to anything taught by Descartes, or favored by Locke, but the sole question was, What did God intend to teach by the words which he used in the book called the Bible? These should be "correctly translated and grammatically understood."

On the last page of the book there is a paragraph which may not be understood by others than those who have read our teachings in the Christian Church. The author says: "The theology taught by Mr. Campbell has come into more or less general acceptance among the Disciples of Christ." Mr. Campbell was a leader, and his early teaching made the Disciples. It might be said that there are some who differ from his teaching, in some particulars, among the Disciples. This "theology," as it is termed, did not come to the Disciples as an organized church to be received or rejected. Again, speaking of the Disciples, he says: "By their elastic constitution they are free to change and develop their theology in the light of the best thought of each succeeding generation." The Disciples, then, have a constitution, an elastic constitution. I never heard of such a thing before. And as to changing their theology by the light of the age or generation is perfectly new to me. I think that the writer was closing up his book when he said that. He had already said that they have their teachings from the Scriptures simply. Certainly the views and philosophies of the men of the generations can have nothing to do whatever with the theology of the Disciples. They get all their faith and discipline from the Word of God and not from the philosophies of advanced thinkers of the generations.

There are many questions discussed by Mr. Campbell not brought out in this work. But those points brought to view are of great interest. He learned, as he proceeded, a point I am glad was presented. On doctrinal matters his debate with Mr. Rice covers nearly everything that can be said, and it would be a good thing if this new book should provoke many of our preachers to purchase that debate and read it. I hope this new candidate for place will receive a large one add be read by many people.

CHRISTIAN PUBLISHING COMPANY. 1522 LOCUST STREET. ST. LOUIS, MO.

OME GREAT LITTLE BO

We call special attention, this week, to four pamphlets which have been widely read and circulated, but which deserve to be even more widely known. Probably you already have one or more of them in your library, but if any are missing you should secure them without delay.

THE LIQUOR TRAFFIC.

"My Experience with the Liquor Traffic," by S. W. Crutcher, is a narrative of thrilling interest. The author is a widely known preacher, and he tells in a very plain, straightforward manner, of his experiences with manufacturers, dispensers and drinkers of whiskey. Some of the incidents related are startling, showing, as they do, the power that the liquor traffic has in the church, in certain places. This is a book of 91 pages.

Price, 25 Cents.

WOMAN.

"Woman in the Home, the State and the Church," is a neat booklet of 67 pages, by W. H. Middleton. The scope of the book is explained by the title. The most attention is given by the author to the discussion of woman's place in the church, and to an explanation of the familiar passage: "Let your women keep silence in the churches." The author's style is plain, direct and forcible. rect and forcible.

Price, 25 Cents.

CHRISTIAN SCIENCE.

"Christian Science Dissected," by A. D. Sector, is one of "Christian Science Dissected," by A. D. Sector, is one of those books that everybody should read. If you know nothing about Christian Science you may be put to confusion by some smooth propagandist of the cult. The author of "Christian Science Dissected" demonstrates that Christian Science is the fraud of the century, and proves Mrs. Eddy to be a charlatan and imposter. The book contains 61 pages.

Price, 25 Cents.

METHODISM.

"Letters to Bishop Morris," is the title given to a book of 204 pages, by J. M. Mathes, which might well have been called. "Why I am not a Methodist." It is naturally a controversial work, but is courteous in tone and Christian in spirit. The author goes carefully over the doctrine and organization of the M. E. Church, demonstrating both to be non-apostolic.

Price, 25 Cents.

A SUGGESTION: Suppose you place a one-dollar bill in an evelope with your order for these our books, and send to us at once, before you forget it. Of course you want these works if you have not already read them, and if you postpone sending your order, you may have trouble remembering the titles or the price. Attend to the matter now, while this advertisement is before you.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The news from China maintains its kaleidoscopic character. Each days' developments impart a somewhat different hue to the situation. At the prosent writing the impression prevalent in London is that the international concert has been ruptured by disagreement among the co-operating nations. So far as we can understand, the points of disagreement seem to be the unwillingness of England, Germany and perhaps some of the other nations to accept Li Hung Chang as the minister plenipotentiary, with whom the nations can negotiate for the settlement of existing differences, and the disposition on the part of some of the other nations to retire from Pekin and allow the Chinese capital to be occupied by the reigning power while peace negotiations are in progress. It is not to be wondered at, in our judgment, that some of the nations should be rather wary of accepting the good offices of Li Hung Chang without the most indisputable proof of his authority to treat with the powers. Nor is it strange that some of the nations would object to vacating the capital until a peace treaty is negotiated. What might be interpreted by some civilized nations as an act of generosity is very likely to be interpreted by the Chinese as an act of cowardice. If the Dowager Empress and her advisers were not in active sympathy with the Boxers in their efforts to slaughter the foreign population, including the ministers of the various nations, they had no reason to vacate the capital. If they were in sympathy and co-operation with the Boxers in their shameful war on those who were entitled to their protection, then they have no business at the capital until they have given some assurance to the nations of repentance and of their purpose to prevent future outrages. It is to be hoped that no political consideration growing out of the present presidential campaign will influence our government in effecting any temporary or superficial compromise with China, which offers no guarantee of future peace. We confess our sympathy with the view that, with the Empress Dowager on the throne and in authority, the lives of our missionaries and civil ministers and merchants in China will still be in peril, and the progress of that country retarded

The recent pronounced victory of the British over the Boers at Machindodoorp, in which the latter, after suffering severe loss, were compelled to retreat from their intrenched position, brings the South African war perceptibly nearer to its close. The Boer leaders can, of course, disperse their forces and carry on a sort of guerrilla warfare for some time to come, but it is difficult to see what good could come of such a policy. Regardless of the merits of the case, it would be a better policy, it seems to us, for the South African Republics to throw themselves on the mercy of Great Britain and of the civilized world. When war ceases to have any reasonable prospect of accomplishing the end for which it was inaugurated, every consideration of humanity would seem to indicate the wisdom of discontinuing it and using other means for acomplishing the same purpose. Lord Roberts has felt justified in view of recent victories in issuing a proclamation annexing the South African Republic to Great Britain under the title of the Transvaal. This ends the separate political existence of the South African Republic, a result which it ought not to have been difficult for the Boers to foresee when once they had made their appeal to arms. However much we may feel inclined to sympathize with the political aspirations of the Boers for a united South African Republic, and however much we are compelled to admire the heroism with which they have waged war against the greatest empire on earth, it is hardly possible to overlook the lack of political sagacity and of far-seeing statesmanship which prevented the Boer leaders from making certain concessions to British demands rather than appealing to the dread arbitrament of war. On the other hand there can but be the universal desire on the part of all disinterested people that Great Britain will be magnanimous in her triumph and deal, not only justly, but even magnanimously, with the brave people who have fought them with such heroism.

Labor Day has come and gone, and the wage-workers of America have once more paraded the streets of our cities in impressive numbers, carrying their banners and emphasizing, as the day is intended to do, the dignity of labor and the importance of the labor problem. At Chicago two notable speeches were made by two notable men, Gov. Roosevelt, of New York, vice-presidential nominee of the Republican party, and Col. Bryan, of Nebraska, presidential nominee of the Democratic party. speeches were both worthy of the men and of the occasion. It was understood and, we believe, demanded by the labor men themselves that there should be a political truce on that day and that no partisan politics were to be injected in the speeches. Mr. Bryan, however, felt that he was justified in view of resolutions passed by various labor organizations in declaring against "government by injunction" and what he called imperialism and militarism. Gov. Roosevelt steered clear of partisan issues and both of them gave wise advice to the wage-earners of the country. Gov. Roosevelt said "the more a healthy American sees of his fellow-Americans the greater grows his conviction that our chief troubles come from mutual misunderstanding, from failure to appreciate one another's point of view. In other words, the great need is fellow feeling, sympathy, brotherhood; and all this naturally comes by association. It is therefore of vital importance that there should be such association." further said: "When we come to dealing with our social and industrial needs, remedies, rights and wrongs, a ton of oratory is not worth an ounce of hardheaded, kindly common sense." Mr. Bryan said: "The first thing to be considered is the laboring man's ambition. What are his aims and his purposes; for what is he striving? The animal needs only food and shelter because he has nothing but the body to care for; but man's wants are more numerous. The animal complains when it is hungry, and is contented when its hunger is appeased; but man, made in the image of his Creator, is a threefold being, and must develop the head and the heart as well as the body. He is not satisfied with mere physical existence; neither will he be content unless all avenues of advancement are open to him. His possibilities must be as unlimited as his aspirations." Both speakers emphasized the dignity of labor, the necessity of human brotherhood, the importance of labor associations and the right of laboring men to a just proportion of the wealth which labor produces in connection with capital. The annual observance of Labor Day can but be productive of good when it is utilized in dignified and statesmanlike discussion of the labor problem, and especially in emphasizing the ethical side of the industrial system.

The "paramount issue" in the case of China, is the question whether or not the Powers have completed what they started out to do. The position which Russia takes in proposing a general withdrawal of troops assumes that they have. The position of Great Britain and Germany assumes that they have not. Certainly, the task which lay before the Powers when the march to Pekin was begun included, not only the immediate restoration of order, but the guarantee of the continued safety of foreigners in China. As it seems to us at present, the second part of this task has not yet been completed. The fact is, there is no Chinese Government at present whose guarantee is worth anything, and the foreign troops cannot safely be withdrawn until the Chinese Government is rehabilitated in some form more substantial and potent than the self-appointed plenipotentiariship of Li Hung Chang. If the Powers wish their work to have any permanent outcome, they must keep possession of the capital until such time as a genuine guarantee of the preservation of order can be given. There has been much suspicion of Russia's sincerity in proposing peace and urging the withdrawal of troops when it is a matter of common knowledge that Russia's settled policy in China is one of aggression. But there is no need to suspect bad faith on the part of the Czar. The fact is, Russia has much to gain and nothing to lose by the speedy termination of hostilities in China. All the powers have troops now on the ground, and if the present trouble should issue in the partition of China, Russia would only be on par with the others. On the other hand, a few years of peace will complete Russia's hold upon the northern part of the Empire, will give opportunity for the completion of the trans-Siberian railway, by which Russian troops can be placed in China in days while the other powers would require weeks, and will give Russia a much larger chance of acquiring a preponderating influence in the affairs of China whether there is a partition or not. Unquestionably, the Czar wants peace now.

THE CHURCH AS A TRAINING SCHOOL.

Christian people generally have allowed themselves to drift away from the conception of the church as an institution for the moral and religious culture of the people as well as for their conversion, and as a training school in which persons are to be taught wise and practical methods of Christian service. It is to be feared that thousands of people come into the church with the idea that this act is an end instead of the beginning point of their religious life. The church is not an end of itself, but is a means to an end, namely, the building up of character in its members, and their preparation for serving their fellowmen.

In the very thoughtful volume by William DeWitt Hyde, president of Bowdoin College, entitled "God's Education of Man," there is a very helpful treatment of this subject, but the able author seems to us to make a wrong classification in the following statement:

"What we need is the increasing recognition that the domestic, economic, commercial, social, political and ecclesiastical spheres are all partial and coordinate phases of the life of service to the one God, who is immanent in them all, and is acceptably served through whatever correlation and subordination of these spheres enables the individual to render most effective service to God and his fellowmen."

The phrase "coordinate phases of the life of service to the one God" is liable to convey the idea, whether it be the author's thought or not, that in each of these spheres of activity one may serve God acceptably without participating in the activities of the others. That is a view which many people now entertain, and by which they are kept out of the church. We do not believe that honesty, philanthropy and disinterested service for one's fellowmen in the commercial, social or political spheres, or even in the domestic sphere, meet the demands of our religious nature or the requirements of God. Rather we regard the church as the training school in which men are fitted for the right sort of service in the domestic, economic, commercial, social, political and all other spheres of life. If this view is correct, then the church is not "coordinate" with these various forms of activity, but sustains a different relation to them than any one of them sustains to it or to each other. If the church does not help men to be better husbands, better economists, better business men, truer and more reliable politicians, better artists and wiser statesmen, then it is indeed only partial in its service to men, and not universal in its scope of influence. We must, it seems to us, hold fast to the thought that the church of God is not simply one of many coordinate agencies for saving men and training them religiously, but that it is the great institution ordained of God for this purpose, and that no man can fulfill his obligations to Jesus Christ and ignore the church which He has founded, no matter how zealous he may be in all other spheres of activity.

President Hyde is right, hower, in emphasizing the fact that a Christian man may serve God acceptably in all these spheres of activity which he mentions, it being understood that first of all he is loyal to Jesus Christ. It is important to bear this fact in mind, because many good people are discouraged because they feel they are doing no "religious work," though they may be mothers who are absorbed in the care and training of their children, and with the domestic drudgery, which ceases to be drudgery because it is transformed into service of God by the spirit of love; or they may be public men, whose time and energies are absorbed in the details of administration in some form of public service for the good of their fellowmen; or humble mechanics or laboring men, whose time is required and energies are exhausted by the labor they perform for the maintenance of their families. All these classes of persons should know that in so far as they are faithful in the performance of their daily tasks, and are conscientiously discharging the duties of their several callings, they are serving God and are doing religious work. It would bring new inspiration to thousands of toilsome lives if they could feel and realize that in their humble spheres and in their own way they, too, are serving God acceptably in fulfilling their appointed missions in life.

It is the mission of the church to infuse the spirit of religion into all callings and pursuits, and to train its members for faithful and efficient servi e in every sphere of human activity. What dignity and value this gives to the church of God! How bread and beneficent its mission! Its spirit, its very atmosphere, its teaching, its training, should be such that all those within its influence should feel the inspiration of its high motives and be better fitted to render honest and disinterested service to humanity in whatever sphere of human activity their lot may be cast. We need not state how this thought magnifies the position of the preacher of the gospel and pastor of a church. All that education and the widest culture can do for men ought to be done for those who are to occupy the places of spiritual teachers and leaders of the people in our churches. Only such men can fulfill in the highest degree the work of the ministry, and only churches that are equipped with such men can fulfill their mission as training schools to prepare men for consecrated service in every department of human toil.

THE BIRTHDAY OF THE CHURCH.

The conclusion of the article of Brother Bays will be found this week in this issue, and we call attention to a few points in his argument.

We cannot understand the purpose of the array of Scripture passages to be found at the beginning of Brother B.'s article, if they be not intended as proof that repentance and remission of sins in the name of Jesus Christ did not begin at Jerusalem on the Pentecost following Christ's resurrection. It would have been far more reverent, it seems to us, if our brother had taken up the declaration of Jesus in Luke 24:46, 47 and tried to show that the passage does not mean what it seems to assert on its surface. There is nothing in any of the passages which he cites to show that the meaning which we gave to this passage is not its true meaning. There is no question between us about repentance and remission of sins having been preached both by John and Jesus during the the earthly ministry of our Lord. There is no difference on the point that demons were cast out in the name of Christ during his earthly ministry. But Jesus' asserts, after His resurrection from the dead, that repentance and remission of sins in His name was to begin at Jerusalem, and as a matter of history we know that it did so begin on the first Pentecost after Christ's resurrection from the dead. Peter said to those convicted of sin and inquiring what they must do: "Repent ye, and be baptized everyone of you, in the name of Jesus Christ unto the remission of your sins, and ye shall receive the gift of the Holy Spirit" If any preacher before this date ever preached re pentance or remission of sins in the name of Christ there is no record of it, and if there were there would certainly be an antagonism between such a passage and the statement of the risen Lord, to which we have

In discussing John's baptism Brother Bays takes the strange position that John required faith in Christ as a condition of his baptism. This is to wholly misunderstand the relation of John's work to that of Christ's. He was preparing a people to accept Christ when He should declare Himself. The people to whom he preached believed in God, and on the basis of that belief he called them to repentance, specifying to various classes what their repentance would involve. As Paul explains it, "John baptized with the baptism of repentance, saying unto the people that they should believe on him which should come after him, that is, on Jesus' (Acts 19:4). They were not required to believe on him, however, as a condition of John's baptism. They were required to repent and be in readiness to believe on him when he should come. Referring to the above passage, Brother Bays says: "When they heard this they [presumably like John's disciples | were baptized in the name of the Lord." But these were John's disciples in the sense that they had received John's baptism. If they had previously been baptized "in the name of the Lord," why should Paul have them rebaptized? Our brother's position leads him into contradictions on every hand.

After a great deal of matter that does not seem to us to be at all relevant to the issue, together with one or two points to which we have already made sufficient reply, our brother asks: "If John preached and baptized in some name other than that of his livine Master, will some one be kind enough to tell us in what name he ministered?" Certainly. How would it do to suppose that John baptized in the name of Him who sent him to baptize? He himself said: "He that sent me to baptize in water, he said unto me, Upon whomsoever thou shalt see the Spirit descending, and abiding upon him, the same is he that baptizeth in the Holy Spirit" (John 1:38). John was sent to baptize, then, by God the Father, who gave him instructions as to how he would recognize His Son when he should apply for baptism. Is it not reasonable to suppose that he baptized in the name and by the authority of Him who sent him? This failure of our brother to make any distinction between the baptism of John and Christian baptism, as taught and practiced by the apostles, is fatal to any clear understanding of dispensational lines, and of the unique features of Christianity which made it distinct from the teaching and preaching of John. Even the east in the kingdom of God was greater than John the Baptist, Jesus tells us—a statement that has no explanation on the ground that the Christian dispensation oegan with John.

Our brother attempts to found an argument on the identity of the "kingdom of neaven" and the church because when Jesus said to Peter: "On this rock I will build my church" he added: "And I will give unto thee the keys of the kingdom of heaven." The argument is lame. The phrases, no doubt, have sometimes the same meaning. The kingdom of God and the church do touch each other, and are identical at certain points, but the kingdom of God has a wider significance than the church. It may be said that the church, as we see it here in the world, is the objective form of the kingdom of God; but the kingdom has a subjective meaning as well. In that subjective meaning the kingdom is to be in us.

The mission of the church is the extension of the kingdom of God throughout the world. Any argument, therefore, founded upon the complete identity of the meaning of the two phrases—"the kingdom of God" and the church—is likely to be fallacious.

Referring once more to the words of the Savior: "And if he shall neglect to hear them, tell it unto the church," etc., and to our explanation that this language is "clearly anticipative," as indeed much of the Savior's teaching was, Brother B. remarks: "Possibly this may be true, and if so, then the foregoing passages should read something like this;" and then he adds the phrase "wait till after the church is organized on Pentecost" to the various passages referring to the church. This is not argument. It is travesty. When Jesus instituted the Supper was it not in anticipation of His death, and was its observance to begin before Pentecost, and before the church was established? And yet we do not find any such modifying clauses as our brother supposes would be necessary in case this were His meaning.

Some of Brother Bays' argumen's are unworthy of him. Take his interpretation of the phrase "at hand" in the passage, "Re pent ye for the kingdom of heaven is at hand." This phrase he says has reference to place, not time, and then he cites a passage concerning Juras in which the phrase does mean near the place as a proof that it always has this meaning! Hence when Jesus said "the kingdom of God is at hand" he meant that it was in "immediate proximity to those addressed!" It would be a waste of time and of space to attempt any reply to an argument like this. If our brother had taken the pains to examine his concordance he would have readily seen the absurdity of ap plying this meaning to the phrase "at hand in many of the passages of the New Testament. So far as we know he is alone in holding that the message which John announced, and which Jesus also proclaimed was that the kingdom of God was near a certain place—being already in existence!

Our brother concludes his argumentation with the following: "Then there can be no doubt that the church dates its beginning with John, and reached its glorious consummation on Pentecost." Strange statement from a teacher and a preacher of the Word of God! The church has not yet "reached its glorious consummation," and will not until it shall be presented without "spot or wrinkle" or any such thing, in the presence of God. It only had its birth on Pentecost, and is even yet struggling with many an imperfection up toward the ideal of its divine Founder.

We have not replied to many of the citations made by our brother, assuming that our readers will be able to discern their true meaning, and see that they do not prove the points for which they are introduced in this discussion. We honor our brother for his courage in breaking away from the materialistic conceptions and erroneous teaching of Mormonism for a more spiritual and scriptual conception of Christianity, and we trust he may keep his mind open to the truth while he continues to be a diligent student of the Word of God.

BARNABAS-A CHARACTER SKETCH.

(Acts 4:32-37; 11:19-26.)

[Uniform Midweek Prayer-meeting Topic, Sept. 12.]
CENTRAL TRUTH: A good man, wholly consecrated to the Lord and to the welfare of his fellowmen, will live in the affectionate remembrance of mankind when the names of the rich and mighty who have lived for self have been covered with oblivion.

The New Testament contains only a few sentences concerning the history and character of Barnabas, but they are enough to give us quite a satisfactory view of the man and contain more of the real essentials of character than many a volume of biography contains. From the brief sketch given in Acts we learn that his proper name was Joseph and that he was surnamed Barnabas by the apostles because of his character and ability in exhortation. He was a Levite and therefore belonged to the priestly tribe of the Jews. This would imply, perhaps, a special religious training. He was a Cyprian by race, being a native of Cyprus. We learn further that he was a man of some property, being the owner of a farm, presumably on the island of Cyprus. That he was a man of portly bearing and prepossessing appearance is indicated by the fact that the Laconians, when they were about to pay divine honors to Paul and Barnabas, called Barnabas Jupiter and Paul Mercury.

It was the good fortune of Barnabas to be among the early disciples of Jesus, and a member of that group of believers at Jerusalem of whom it is said in the passage above cited that "the multitude of them that believed were of one heart and soul: and not one of them said that aught of the things which he possessed was his own; but they had all things common." Among others who sold their possessions and invested the proceeds in the kingdom of God was Barnabas, who "having a field sold it and brought the money and laid it at the apostles' feet." This in itself was an act of such whole-hearted devotion and of unselfish generosity as to indicate the character of the man. He evidently believed in Christ with all his heart and loved his brethren as himself and contributed what he possessed for their welfare and support.

Later on Barnabas filled a most important place in the development of the early church. At the time when the heralds of the new faith went beyond the limits of the Jews, and men of Cyprus and Cyrene ventured as far as Antioch and preached the gospel to the Greeks, and the report of this work had come to Jerusalem, they decided to send some wise counselor down to Antioch to look over the situation and decide what should be done. In looking about for the right man for this delicate mission they selected Barnabas and sent him forth as far as Antioch. Concerning his mission there the record in Acts says that "when he was come and had seen the grace of God he was glad; and he exhorted them all that with purpose of heart they would cleave unto the Lord." A narrower man, a man with less spiritual vision and less breadth of sympathy, might have felt and acted otherwise. They were Greeks coming into the kingd m of God and claiming its benefits and immunities. This was not easy for a Jew of that day to look upon with complaisance. Many of them would have been filled with envy, but Barnabas "was glad" and exhorted them to "cleave unto the Lord."

What is the explanation of this ability on the part of Barnabas to enter into sympathy with the larger purposes of God concerning the Gentiles? The explanation is given in the words which follow: "For he was a good man and full of the Holy Ghost and of faith." It would be difficult to put more that is commendatory in so few words. Blessed is he of whom it can be said under the guidance of the all-seeing Spirit: "He was a good man." Goodness is the only real greatness. To be a good man is to be God's man-thinking God's thoughts, living God's life, doing God's work in the world. But he was also "full of the Holy Ghost and of faith." No wonder, then, he was capable of doing large things; of going on delicate and important missions and of giving advice, comfort and consolation to the disciples. If he had been full of the evil spirit and of doubt he would have been the source of division and strife among the brethren and a stumblingblock in the way of sinners; but instead of that he was dominated by the Holy Spirit, and faith opened to his vision the splendid realities of the unseen world. This enabled him to practice self-denial here with a view of building up that which is eternal and enduring. Who can tell how many of the redeemed in that future world will give Barnabas praise for the consolation they derived from him and the spiritual help which he afforded them by his godly, consecrated life?

The nobility of character in Barnabas is further shown in the fact that he was not ambitious to shine as the supreme luminary in the church at Antioch; he went in search of Saul and found him and brought him to Antioch and labored together with him "for a whole year." Saul, afterwards called Paul, soon came to the front and outshone Barnabas with the brilliancy and strength of his intellect and the fiery impetuosity of his logic; but there is not the slightest intimation that Barnabas ever envied his growing reputation. He rather rejoiced in it for "he was a good man and full of the Holy Ghost and of faith."

When the church in Antioch wished to send relief unto the brethren that dwelt in Judea they did so "by the hand of Barnabas and Saul." Later on in the record this order is reversed and it becomes Saul and Barnabas. But who knows how much the world is indebted to Barnabas for what Saul, afterwards named Paul, wrought among the Gentiles as a great missionary as well as expounder and defender of the Caristian religion?

The church is indebted to such men as Barnabas in all ages for its spiritual power, its aggressiveness and its triumphs. Not by the might of intellect, not by social power or prestige, not by wealth or rank is the church made strong and victorious, but by good men, "full of the Holy Ghost and of faith." May the number of such be multiplied in the church of our day.

PRAYER.

Almighty Father, we thank Thee for the gift of good men which Thou hast given to the church in all ages. We thank Thee for the influence of their consecrated lives upon the world, and for the inspiration they furnish us to seek to make our lives like theirs. We pray Thee that Thou wouldst bless Thy church to-day by raising up men of large spiritual vision who shall be great in their goodness and who shall be filled with the Holy Spirit and with faith, that they may lead Thy people, under Jesus Christ our supreme Leader, into a richer and deeper life and into a successful warfare with all the powers of darkness. And this we ask in the name and for the sake of Thy Son, Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen!

Editor's Easy Chair or MACATAWA MUSINGS.

We have previously referred to the fact that the windows from our semi-octagon study on the lake look out in many directions, through which we take note of past and coming events. One of these looks directly out across the lake to Old Missouri, and we have been thinking of our annual Convention to assemble at Moberly on the 15th of September. We have been wondering whether the National Convention, coming a month later at Kansas City, will be permitted to eclipse our State Convention. It should not be allowed to do this by any means. The more successful our State Convention, the greater the impetus we will give to the National Convention. There are important matters to receive consideration and action at our State Convention at Moberly, which cannot be attended to at Kansas City in October. Those who are in the habit of attending our State Convention because they are interested in the work we are doing in the State, and to lend their assistance to make these conventions a success, will not, we think, remain away because of the proximity of the National Convention. There will be nearly a month intervening between the two conventions, and this will be ample time for resting up from the one before attending the other. Viewed from this distance, and from the point of view which we occupy, it occurs to us that the brotherhood of Missouri has some very important business to discharge in order to deepen and widen its influence in the State, and that this business ought to receive our consideration in the coming Convention at Moberly. What this [business is we may indicate before the Convention occurs. What we ask now is that our membership in Missouri give their undivided attention to the Missouri Stete Convention until that is past and then get ready for the National Convention.

Blessings brighten as they depart! A the time for our departure from this breezy lakeshore and from the fair scenes of Maca tawadraws nearer, every hour seems to be precious; every opportunity for recreation seems to have a distinct value. How we have enjoyed, during the past week our quiet little sails in the afternoon over Macatawa Bay, and up to the center of Black Lake to the happy fishing grounds! By attaching the sail to front part of our row boat, we glide along smoothly, easily and merrily. There is no other method of locomotion quite equal to sailing when the conditions are right. There is no creaking of machinery, no smoke of engine, and then there is the delightful sensation as you glide along, of getting some thing for nothing, The wind is doing the work and you shoply sit back on your cushion and enjoy it. A few hours spent in this sart of recreation, especially if they be crowned with a good string of fish, as is the rule, do much to relieve the mind from its vexations, cares and worries and prepare it for its duties on the following day. But the season for this sort of recreation will soon be past and the routine of editorial duties will be taken up with little intermittence for recreation until another season rolls around. So we try to make the most of it while it lasts and get out of it an equipment of vitality and strength for more efficient service. That, at last, is the measure of the value of summer vacations or outings-the preparation they impart for more and better work.

Since the foregoing was written all the household of Edgewood-on-the-Lake have de parted except the editor and his wife, and we will have departed before this appears Great quiet prevails. When we awoke this morning a squirrel was chattering in a tre near our bedroom window. Last night we went with some of the family to Holland where they preferred to take the Chicago boat, rather than wait for it to touch at thi We rode down the little lake on th "City of Holland" as far as Macatawa doc with them. It would be difficult to imagin a more beautiful night and a lovelier scene The stars shone out with unwonted brill iance. The crescent moon hung above the western horizon an hour's height. Th placid little lake, smooth as a mirror, re flected these lights above and the lower light along the shore. The Macatawa and Ottawa Beach hotels were in a blaze of electri glory, and out through the channel beyond the U.S. Life Saving Station lay Lake Mich igan, touched into a dream of beauty by th silver light of the half-full moon. What: night for crossing the lake! How it con trasted with the night when we last lande at this port from Chicago, when black clouds rolled up from the north, as chariot of the wind, and a hurricane tore the lak into mountain ranges of billows with inter vening valleys, and our vessel was tosse about like a cork on the tumultuous waves But such are life's contrasts. Tears to-day smiles to-morrow. A quiet moonlit have to-day, to-morrow a rolling sea and a starless sky. Now the sun of peace shining full upon us; now the storm of battle with temptation and trial. But what does it matter whether it be calm or storm if only He who stilled the waves of the Galilean Sea be with us to sanctify the joy or the sorrow, the calm or the storm, the peace or the conflict, to our spiritual profit?

This paragraph is penned on the eve of our departure. The Park is by no means depopulated yet. The warm weather is keeping a great many people here. It is with regret that we return to the city two weeks earlier than usual, but we may make this up when we return, later in the season, to close up the cottage for winter. Last Lord's day was one of the rainiest days we have ever seen at the Park, and yet, in spite of that fact we had a good Sunday school at 3 P. M., and an astonishingly large audience at the preaching service at 4 P. M., consideridg the downpour of rain at that hour. G. W. Muckley, of Kansas City, preached a very thoughtful discourse on the Seen and the Unseen. He has made Macatawa his headquarters for the summer, but he has radiated from that centre all around in behalf of Church Extension. We sincerely trust his expectations may be met in the September collection. The Sunday-school at the Park has been conducted this year by J. S. Hughes, of Chicago, and he has ac quitted himself with great credit. He is a man of striking originality, high moral ideals and should be wholly engaged in ministerial and pastoral work. But the time is up. The "City of Holland" is moving down Macatawa Bay to carry us across the lake. For the present, dear old Macatawa, good-

En route home from Macatawa Park we spent Lord's day in Chicago and attended services at the First Church, meeting in an elegant hall on Forty-seventh and Indiana Avenues, for which Bro. Tyrrell is pastor. We were glad to notice a good audience present in spite of the hot weather, and the sermon was one of the most helpful and uplifting we have heard for some time. After the close of the morning service the secretary read a communication from Bro. Tyrrell, announcing his resignation, to take effect according to agreement, in sixty days. The secretary also read resolutions adopted by the official board, highly commending the work of Bro. Tyrrell as well as his character and ability. Bro. Tyrrell's plans for the future are not matured, we think, but he contemplates entering the lecture field without abandoning the ministry, and perhaps doing some special work in connection with one of our religious papers. He feels himself better adapted to a general work of that kind than to the routine duties of the pastorate. For our part we sincerely regret his action, and believe that he is capable of great usefulness as pastor of a church, and that he will ultimately see that this is the path of duty for him. The church there has increased to a membership of about two hundred from a few members, under his labors, and with wise and energetic leadership in the future it is capable of accomplishing great good in the midst of that great city. It was a great delight to us to spend a part of the day with Brother Tyrrell's family, to whom we feel closely attached by years of intimate relationship. May the benediction of the gracious Father rest upon them, both parents and children, and use them increasingly for the furtherance of his great purposes on earth. . . These closing lines are written in our St. Louis office, where we have taken up once more the familiar lines of work, only slightly relaxed, and grateful to the gracious Providence for strength to go forward with renewed vigor.

Questions and Hnswers.

If prayer profit anything, why not pray to God to preserve from all harm our missionaries in China, instead of sending our armies there? Is it not true that there is no profit in personal prayers, and that God does not hear or answer such prayers? Is it not folly to make personal requests of him when he has given us the law that supplies our every need? Do ministers of the gospel depend upon prayer to heal their sick? Rather do they not resort to A Reader. drugs:

These questions indicate a very confused state of mind on the whole subject of prayer. What the querist means by "personal prayer" is perhaps prayer for one's own benefit. Prayer, of course, should not be limited to one's self, but to exclude one's self from the benefit of prayer would be absurd. The publicar who prayed: "Lord, have mercy on me, a sinner," made a decidedly personal prayer, and it seems to have been "justified" in the sight of the Lord. The man who does not pray for himself is not likely to pray for other people. Our querist does not seem to have learned the simple truth that prayer is not a substitute for the exercise of common sense and our best efforts in securing what we desire. The man who prays for his sick child and puts forth no effort at the same time for its recovery shows either insincerity in his prayer or that he is under the spell of some fatal delusion. Satan himself could ask for no better device to further his interest than to have men believe that human agency is inconsistent with prayer for divine assistance. One other thing seems to have escaped the notice of this inquirer, namely, that God has not abdicated his throne in favor of every man who has some pet scheme he wishes to accomplish. In other words, God has never promised to answer prayer unconditionally. He reserves the right, as every wise father does, of withholding such things from his children as he sees are not good for them. It is right for Christians to pray for the protection of missionaries in China. It is right for the government to demand their protection from the Chinese Government and to enforce that demand.

In your issue of August 9th, in reply to the question of S. A. Nesbit, "What is the history of the right hand of fellowship?" your reply es-sumes, without satisfactory edidence to me, at least, that James, Cephas and John, recognized as pillars in the church at Jerusalem, gave the right hand of fellowship to Paul and Barnabas to welcome them to church membership. What proof is there that this was the case? M. T. Moye.

The answer in question did not assume that the right hand of fellowship was given to Paul and Barnabas "to welcome them to church membership." The fact was cited as an instance of the use of the right hand of fellowship. It certainly was not given them to welcome them into the church at Jerusalem. It was an expression of Christian recognition and fellowship on the part of these pillar apostles for Paul and Barnybas. This is its meaning in its current use. It is never a means of receiving persons into the membership of the church, but simply a method of expressing Christian fellowship.

A short time ago I attended a service held by some persons who call themselves "Saints," and during the singing of a hymn each one held up a hand. I asked what it meant and was told that it was in conformity to 1 Tim. 2:8: "Lifting up holy hands without wrath and doubting." Is that the meaning of the passage? I have not been accustomed to associate it with the "service of song."

This is one of those fanciful interpretations which has been put upon the text referred to which is without any authority. The lifting up of hands was customary, as it is yet in many cases, in connection with prayer, and in this connection it stands for the act of prayer.

- 1. If a member of the Christian Church is accused of any misdemeanor, be it great or small, what is the first duty of the elders in taking action against said member where the charges are rumors?
- 2. Can elders have a private meeting and withdraw from said member without letting him know that they have charges against him or giving him a chance to defend himself in any way or acknowledging wherein he did wrong or has not?
- 3. Can they withdraw from said party without his ever being present or having a word in self-defense or being interviewed at any time on the subject?
- 1. The elders are not supposed to take action "against" a member, but in his behalf, with a view of saving him. Where charges exist in the form of rumors, if they possess any gravity, the truth of the rumors shou'd be first investigated.
- 2. Certainly not. This question is often asked and it must be that there are cases where this simple rule is ignored. The accused should always have the right to be heard in self-defense, and any act of exclusion which denies them this right is a species of tyranny.
- 3. No, not if the party desires to be present and make his defense. If the party refuses to be present at an investigation, and the crime with which he is charged is satisfactorily sustained, the absence of the accused party must be taken as equivalent to pleading guilty.

THE UNDERLYING UNITY OF SPIRIT.

JOSEPH FORT NEWTON.

Creeds divide men into sects. Every creed was framed to exclude some party. The intellect is devisive. Creeds are not intended to unite men, but to separate them. A universal creed is impossible. Men feel alike, but they think differently. A unity of spirit is what we really need. Much of the difference between people religiously is a difference in word only. We have various forms of words, but we mean the same thing. If we knew more about each other we might discover that we are not so far apart as we imagine. It is possible that we have been most intolerant about doctrines which are the least useful. "The quantity of the intolerance has always been inversely to the value of the doctrine." When we try to force our beliefs upon others, words grow warm and charity grows cold. Love your fellow so well that you will allow him to be This may be the meaning of the free. Golden Rule.

Experience shows that ideas are not the strongest bonds of union. Nor is a creed necessary to unity of effort. The great fraternities among men are not held together by uniformity of opinion. Uniformity is as impossible as it is undesirable. Brotherhood is a word not found in the bright lexicon of intellect; it is born of the heart. Love is greater than logic; sympathy is more powerful than syllogism. Fraternity is diviner than theology; fellowship is sweeter than formulæ. Men differ because they are different, and brotherhood means that each has the right to be as different as nature intended, with equal respect for the difference. True brotherhood recognizes and appreciates the difference among men; it goes down below all creeds and forms, below all theories and theologies, below all beliefs, true or false, written or unwritten, and appeals to the divinity within man, and lifts him into a larger and more luminous life. Freedom and fraternity are the two hemispheres of the same great globe. Real religion unites liberty and love. Life would be dull if we were all alike. Uniformity and monotony are almost synonyms. Fraternity does not mean conformity. must make allowance for the personal equation in religion. Types of temperament may explain some of the larger divisions of the church, but the distinctions between sects are for the most part purely artificial. In the great moments of life all differences fade away and the true unity of humanity is revealed. A great sorrow sweeps away all the barriers of creed and custom, and men stand together as brethren. Surely, we can forget our dividing walls in the presence of the great Father.

Geo. Eliot once said: "The tides of the divine life in man move under the thickest ice of theory." This may explain why men are often better than their creeds. A pure and noble life is not infrequently associated with the most fantastic philosophy. Good men may believe creeds and cruel creeds; bad men may believe lofty creeds. Every day we meet men whose deeds condemn their creeds, and men whose creeds condemn their deeds. We are not to judge men by their theories, but by their lives. A pure life will sanctify a creed; a creed can never sanctify a life. Creeds are not always the product of experience, nor do they accurately express the spiritual life. Often they are held by force of habit. It may be that old and absurd dogmas are retained because of an inability to express the realities of the divine life in a form of words. We never feel the poverty of language as keenly as when we attempt to give those deep realities of the inner life a "local habitation and a name" Underneath all the varieties of expression the divine life in the soul is essentially the same. In the holy of holies of every human life the soul meets God alone. No pen can write, no tongue tell, no artist paint what takes place there. It is the sacred secret of the soul. All races of men are one in this. All human souls are alike genetically, and the divine life flows into all similarly. Usually, men do not talk about this. Certainly, no creed can give adequate expression to this deep life of man. All attempts to weave it into words fail utterly. If in nature, in the glowing tints of sunset and the growing buds of summer, in the color of the flower and the play of life, there are inscrutable forces and phenomena, as in the hidden life of the spirit there are things invisible and unutterable. These experiences cannot be described without profaning their sacred peace and joy. They elude the touch of the most delicate vocabularly. If the scientist cannot define animal life, surely the theologian cannot define the spiritual life. No words can contain the thoughts that thrill and the hopes that enchant us. Speech is an impertinence. Symbols are unsatisfactory. Poetry alone may attempt the impossible task, and for this reason the sacred books of all peoples have been written for the most part in poetic form. What we believe and why, in the deepest sense, is incommunicable. The realities of truth and knowledge deal at first hand with each mind, so great is the deference with which the universe treats the soul.

This is the real unity which binds us together—a unity without which all creeds and forms were ropes of sand. This is the keynote which blends all the chords of life into the sublime symphony of love. The conduct of the soul in response to that didivine influence is as variable as individual temperament, family characteristic and race peculiarity. Naturally, when man tries to express this inner life, his conception is clothed in the image of his physical environment and colored by degree of his intellectual development. Every system of religion shows this inner life looking out through the prism of the mind.

While we are debating whether we should revise our creeds and bring them into harmony with the larger and more liberal thought of this age it may be well to emphasize those simple and eternal truths which overarch all sects and those spiritual experiences which underly all creeds. That which in a good creed has most permanent and practical effect will surely survive its theological and ecclesiastical form. Modern thought has enlarged our horizon and extended our vision until it is difficult to frame definitions. Everywhere suggestion is taking the place of definition. Definition provokes debate; suggestion enlarges thought and stimulates research. There is a dogmatism about definition that is repellant to the man who looks out upon the infinite sweep of human progress. In regard to morals there are fewer rules and less rigid than there used to be. There is more morality and there are less maxims, just as faith is deeper and formulas fewer. Every day we feel the variety of modern life and the vastness of modern thought. Doubt has driven us away from degma and we are thrown back upon the intuitive convictions and eternal affirmations of the soul. For this we should be devoutly grateful. This is common ground. Here we can meet and stand together. This is the true basis of union. It reveals the deep unity of life, the vital ties of spiritual brotherhood. Amid the confusion and complexity of modern thought let us stand squarely upon those universal and eternal truths which are affirmed by the intuition and intellect of man. and confirmed by thought and experiencetruths the verity and value of which have been tried by fire. If "the tides of the divine life in man move under the thickest ice of theory," when the icy crust of creed is melted away under the warm glow of a larger love they will swell into a noble river that will sweep on in majesty and melody, cleansing the cities and enriching the vallevs, turning stagnant pools into prattling brooks, and sending their freshness and beauty through all the fields of thought and life. This is the underlying and undying unity of man.

All efforts to unite men by requiring conformity to creeds and forms must in the nature of the case prove futile. Surely, the annals of church history confirm this conclusions, for doctrines and ordinances have been the causes of contention in all countries and in all centuries. Again and again the church has permitted the magnificent enthusiasm of a new reformation to subside unutilized, while theologians were attempting to give the larger thought in the rigid formulas of a petrified theology. And in every instance the glow of the new life paled, and the church settled back into a barren, stony orthodoxy and a dead polemical dogmatism. The flood receded and the dividing walls reappeared.

An intellectual interpretation of spiritual experience may be necessary, but it should not spoil the beauty of that deeper and more vital unity of spirit. Certainly, no dogmatic statement should be made a test of spiritual fellowship. Nor should we allow the soft and tender radiance of sentiment to blind us to the duty of forming the highest and purest conception of spiritual truth. Intellectual clearness is not inconsistent with sincere devotion to all valid ethical and spir-tual ideals. We cannot have too much inellectual life and vigor. But we should never make our intellectual expositions, nowever clear and correct they may be, tandards by which to measure the spiritual ife of our fellows; for an inability to accept lear and liberal conceptions does not indiate an absence of pure spiritual life. After ill, it may be that our most refined philosohies of religion are much nearer the shapeess myths of the primeval savage than they re to the Divine Reality, and thus infinite emoteness from the Supreme Ideal should give us a sense of closer fellowship with hose who hold different views, and inspire vithin us a reverent tenderness for those eliefs in which many of our fellowmen find onsolation. If we consider the limitations nd imperfections of human thought we hall understand that dogmatism, both orhodox and liberal, is absurd; that the condence of those who fancy that their creed ontains the final results of progress is oolish, and that all our religious conceptions re ideal conceptions, the most exalted of hem farther from the final Truth than are he lowest from the loftiest.

Old forms and phrases which shock the elicate nerves of a refined intellect are to he average man steppingstones which elphim to rise from the meshes of mental haos—crude instruments by which he utters that in him is far better, and so help him o realize more to himself his own feelings. hey do him no harm, for he sees only the good that is in them, and he does not undertand them save in so far as they give voice o that lifting up of soul after which he is ver striving. That the errors contained in hese ancient forms are errors only in their orm, while in substance they are full of pirit and of truth, is shown by the fact that ll our larger and more liberal conceptions re simply elaborations of and more exalted hought drawn from those original beliefs. he old dogmas may be utterly preposterus to the rational mind. But in saying his we have not said all; they contain ernels of truth within their worthless hells. While they contain truth enough o bless those of sufficiently limited development to receive such teaching with mental onfusion and disgust, they also contain eror enough to ruin more refined natures uterly. Happy is the man who escapes the itter agonies which befall the man on whom he ill expressed and worse understood exeriences, the crude conjecture and imaginaion of ancient theologians are forced as he thoughts and will of the eternal Father.

Underneath all our conceptions there is an essential unity of spirit. This spiritual ife is the supreme thing. There are men in all churches who live pure and lovely lives; who perform "deeds of daring excellence;" who "thrill with wonder at the tender grace and solemn mystery of things;" who aspire to the loftiest and holiest ideals; who breathe that divine spirit which made the Man of Nazareth what he was; who love the good, the beautiful and the true. As some one has well said, "'When a god would ride anything serves him for a chariot;" and when a man full of all peace and charity would go riding forth to help and cheer and bless his fellowmen any creed will bear him on its scaly back as safely as the monster Gergon bore Dante and his guide; in great, long, sweeping circles through the seventh pit of hell." If we could tear away the veil of outward creed and form and look into the inner life of men we should find that millions of people who really imagine they are revering entirely different things are standing in the same great temple and lifting shining faces to the same eternal verities of love and truth and beauty, and should a voice of gentle stillness speak from the holy of holies there would be a cry like that of the men in sacred story: "How hear we every man in our own tongue wherein we were born?" Presbyterian and Unitarian Roman Catholic and Agnostic, Jew and Gentile, Brahmin and Buddhist, Christian and Mohammedan, would clasp hands and shout for joy at the delivery of the universal spiritual brotherhood of man. For God "hath made of one blood all nations of men for to dwell upon the face of the earth, that they should seek the Lord, if haply they might feel after him and find him, though he be not far trom every one of us: for in him we live and move and have our being."

Let us hope that out of this complexity and confusion of modern thought, amid the crumbling of creeds and the clashing of sects and system, there will emerge a simple religion of love and duty and hope-a religion that will require nothing of man save that he "do justly, love mercy and walk humble before God"-a religion that will teach those eternal truths which run like gleaming threads of gold through all the great theologies of the race-a religion that will preach a positive, practical and progressive gospel-a religion that will inspire man to live that life of purity, love and truth which is endorsed by the heart-beats of his own best nature. It is the mission of the true church of humanity to encourage that freedom of thought without which religion is shallow superstition, and that purity of heart without which liberty is license; to foster that intellectual culture without which manhood is rudimentary, and that spiritual character without which intelligence is the slave of greed and passion. What detains the church from this lofty life? It waits for a breadth of mind and a depth of soul to escape from the lifeless letter to the living spirit; it waits a sweet ness of sympathy "that will bring men, not into the temple only, vocal with music and eloquence, but into the great world, vocal with sobs and eloquent with tears;" it waits for the pulpit to pass from dogmas which confound the intellect, confuse the conscience and transform the sanctuary into an arena of debate, to those universal truths which "lie upon the human heart like a child upon its mother's bosom, precious and inseparable;" it waits for the devotion of earnest women and the co-operation of forceful men, who love their race and labor for its salvation; it waits for a spirit of loving service like that which glorified the martyred Man of Nazareth, of whom it may be said truly:

"With reverent feet the earth he trod, Nor banished nature from his plan, But studied still with deep research, To build a universal church, Lofty as is the love of G d, And ample as the wants of man." Non-sectarian Church, St. Louis, Mo.

"BIRTHDAY OF THE CHURCH."

D. H. BAYS.

(Concluded.)

IN WHAT NAME DID JOHN MINISTER?

That "repentance and remission of sins" was preached by both John and Jesus is shown by the following:

"In those days came John the Baptist, preaching in the wilderness of Judea and saying, Repent ye, for the kingdom of heaven is at hand" (Matt. 3:1, 2).

"From this time [John's imprisonment] Jesus began to preach and to say, Repent, for the kingdom of heaven is at hand" (Matt. 4:17).

That both Jesus and John baptized penitent believers is placed beyond cavil by the testimony of the divine witnesses in the following language. John says:

"I indeed baptize you in water unto repentance" (Matt. 3:11).

"After these things came Jesus and his disciples into Judea [where John was baptizing]; and there he tarried with them and baptized." "And they [John's disciples] came unto John and said unto him, Rabbi, he that was with thee beyond Jordan, to whom thou bearest witness, behold the same baptizeth, and all men come to him" (John 3:22-26).

Concerning John's baptism it is said:

"Then went out to him Jerusalem, and all Judea, and all the regions round about Jordan, and were bapdized of him in Jordan, confessing their sins" (Matt. 3:5, 6).

"And he [John] came into all the country about Jordan, preaching the baptism of repentance for the remission of sins" (Luke 3:3).

Here the fact is disclosed that John's baptism was in some manner associated with "the remission of sins." In the aggregate of these passages we learn that faith, in somebody or something, repentance, confession and baptism, were required by both John and Christ—exactly what was required after Pentecost. Faith in whom? A correct answer to this question will furnish the key to this somewhat intricate question. Who was John preaching? To this question there can be but one answer—Christ. The new dispensation was Christo-centric. Everything pointed to the great consummation. Said John to the assembled multitude:

"Behold the Lamb of God, which taketh away the sin of the world" (John 1:29).

While instructing the "certain disciples" at Ephesus Paul explained that "John verily baptized with the baptism of repentance, saying unto the people that they should believe on him which should come after him, that is, on Christ Jesus" (Acts 19:4).

This places beyond question the fact that John told the people to believe on Christ Jesus"—exactly what Paul and Silas told the Philippian jailer he must do to be saved (Acts 16:31), and just what Paul doubtless told the Ephesians they must do, for "when they heard this they [presumably like John's disciples] were baptized in the name of the Lord Jesus" (Acts 19:5).

Paul's object doubtless was to call the attention of these converts to the fact that John always taught the people to believe on Christ before they were baptized.

If John taught the people that they must "believe on Christ Jesus," and if his baptism was in any manner whatever associated with "the remission of sins," what could be more reasonable than that they should be baptized in the name of him in whom they were most certainly required to believe? If, then, John was preaching Christ—if his mission was to prepare the way before him (Isa. 40:3; Matt. 3:3) and "make his paths straight—"is it not allogether reasonable to suppose that whatever he did would be done in the name of Christ? Again:

Did the people who lived anterior to the cross receive salvation in some name other than that of Christ? To be more specific, did John and his disciples receive and offer salvation in any other name? If you are inclined to answer affirmatively, then we ask you to confront Peter, who authoritatively declares of Christ:

"This is the stone which was set at naught of you builders, which is become the head of the corner. Neither is there salvation in any other: for there is none other name under heaven, given among men, whereby we must be saved" (Acts 4:11, 12).

"He shall save his people from their sins" (Matt. 1:21).

If it be objected that "Jesus was not yet glorified" (John 7:39), we answer that Jesus was nevertheless the Savior of his people, and as such, during his personal ministry, authorized the use of his name, as may be seen by the following:

"And John answered him, saying, Master, we saw one casting out devils in thy name" (Mark 9:38).

Here we find a man casting out devils in the name of Christ, one of the very things which Mark includes in the great commission (Mark 16:17); and one of the remarkable things about it is that he did it with our Lord's approval:

"But Jesus said, Forbid him not: for there is no man who shall do a miracle in my name that can lightly speak evil of me" (Mark 9:39). See also verse 41 and Luke 9:49, 50.

That the disciples, during the personal ministry of our Lord, met in his name is rendered reasonably clear by the following:

"For where two or three are gathered together in my name, there am I in the midst of them" (Matt. 18:20).

Who were those who thus early assembled in his name? None other than "the nucleus of believers," known and recognized as the church. After giving directions as to how this "nucleus of believers" should proceed in the case of an offending brother, Jesus instructed them as follows:

"And if he shall neglect to hear them, tell it to the church" (Matt. 18:17).

But Bro. Garrison thinks this reference to the church "is clearly anticipative," but why he so regards it we are not informed. But until some sound, scriptural reason is given for believing this reference to the church is "anticipative," with all due deference to Bro. Garrison's views I must continue to regard it as a reference to something at the time existing which Jesus called "the church" (v. 17).

If John preached and baptized in some name other than that of his divine Master, will some one be kind enough to tell us in what name he ministered?

Bro. Garrison's next point is the following: "When Christ said: 'I will build my church," he said to Peter: 'I will give unto thee the keys of the kingdom of heaven'—the authority to make known the conditions of admission into it."

The only reference to the church in this passage is found in the term "the kingdom of heaven." The kingdom of heaven, then, according to Bro. Garrison, means the church. When Jesus, therefore, speaks of the kingdom of heaven he means the church; and the "keys" are the "authority to make known the conditions of entering into it." The keys to a new building are usually not turned over by the builder till the structure is completed. At the very beginning of Pentecost we find Peter in possession of the keys in question, for "this authority was exercised on Pentecost," and hence the structure must have been at least partially completed before that time.

Let us examine a few passages in which "the kingdom of heaven" occurs, bearing in mind the fact that it means the church. Only a few weeks after the conversation recorded in Matt. 16:18 the disciples came to Jesus and asked:

"Who is greatest in the kingdom of heaven" (Matt. 18:1.)? Or, "Who is greatest in the church?" The answer was:

"Whosoever, therefore, shall humble himself as this little child, the same is greatest in the kingdom of heaven" (Ibid. 16:4).

"But if offences come, how shall we proceed?" This question might have been and probably was asked by the disciples.

Jesus then gave them the following rule of action in such cases:

"Moreover, if thy brother trespass against thee, go and tell him his fault between thee and him alone; if he shall hear thee, thou hast gained thy brother. But if he will not hear thee, then take with thee one or two more, that in the muth of two or three witnesses [in case of a trial in the church] every word shall be established. And if he shall neglect to hear them, tell it unto the church; but if he neglect to hear the church, let him be unto thee as an heathen man and a publican" (Matt. 18:15-17).

Here "the kingdom of heaven" and "the church" are clearly identical, but to avoid the argument in favor of an ante-Pentecostal church we are told that all this instruction is "clearly anticipative." Possibly this may be true, and if so, then the foregoing passages should read something like this:

"Moreover, if thy brother shall trespass against thee, wait till after the church is organized on Pentecost, and then go and tell him his fault between thee and him alone.

But if he will not hear thee, wait till after Pentecost, and then take with thee one or two more, . . . and if he shall neglect to hear them, tell it to the church after it is organized on Pentecost!"

Now, candidly, do you have the remotest idea that any such thought was in the mind of Jesus when he uttered these words? Is there a single thing to indicate that his trusting disciples ever dreamed that they were to wait till after Pentecost before carrying out these plain instructions of their Master? Impossible! Never but once did Jesus command his disciples to wait, and that was when he comman ed them to tarry at Jerusalem for their enduement with power from on high.

In view of these facts who can believe that Jesus meant or that the apostles understood that these instructions were not to be carried out till after "the Pnntecost following Christ's resurrection?" But as if to enable the apostles to put his teachings into immediate practice, and at the same time assure them that their actions were to be authoritative and binding, he said unto them:

"Whatsoever ye shall bind on earth shall be bound in heaven; and whatsoever ye shall loose on earth shall be loosed in heaven." (Matt. 18:18).

Here, as nearly as the date can be located, is the time when Jesus transferred "the keys of the kingdom of heaven" (Matt. 16:19) to Peter; and if this be the time, then the church must have existed before Pentecost. That what Jesus called "the church" or "kingdom of heaven" (Matt. 16:18, 19; 18:18) existed before Pentecost we think is clearly shown by the following:

"Repent ye, for the kingdom of heaven is at hand" (Matt. 3:1, 2; 4:17; 10:7).

Jesus here represents "the kingdom of heaven," whatever that may mean, as being at hand. To be "at hand" means to be "in immediate proximity to," "near in place." "At hand," therefore, has reference to place, not time. To illustrate: Jesus said of Judas: "Behold he is at hand" (Mark 14:42). This could only mean that Judas existed, and that he was at the time "in immediate proximity to" those addressed. Hence, when Jesus said "the kingdom of heaven is at hand" he could only have meant that it not only existed, but that it was in easy reach of those who might seek it.

"Seek ye first the kingdom of God" (Matt. 6:33) is in perfect harmony with this thought. To Nicodemus Jesus said: "Except a man be born of water and of the spirit he cannot enter into the kingdom of God" (John 3:5).

To enter the kingdom of God, therefore, is to enter the church. Did people enter the kingdom of heaven before Pentecost? If so, then logically they entered the church. With this in view let us hear what Jesus has to say on the subject:

"The law and the prophets were until John; since the time the kingdom of heaven preached, and every man presseth into it' Luke 16:16).

The above clearly indicates that John's cinistry marked the beginning of a new ispensation. The old Jewish regime was o close and a new system of government be inaugurated. This new system is called the kingdom of heaven." In the above we have men "pressing into" the kingdom of eaven. Could men press into a kingdom, or anything else, that had no existence? Who will answer? If "the kingdom of God" means the church, then we have men seeking," "finding" and "pressing into" the church from the days of John the Baptist. This view is clearly confirmed by the fol-

"From the days of John the Baptist until low, the kingdom of heaven suffereth vioence and the violent take it by force" Matt. 11:12).

In view of this violent opposition to the singdom of God, the disciples no doubt at simes became discouraged; and so Jesus, to encourage them and strengthen their faith, said unto them:

"Upon this rock I will build my church, and the gates of hell shall not prevail against t" (Matt. 16:18).

If "the kingdom of heaven," of which eter held the keys (Matt. 16:19), means the church—and no one denies it—then there can be no doubt that the church dates to "beginning" with John, and reached its glorious consummation on Pentecost. But it does not mean the church, then it is night time that our preachers revise some of their finest sermons; for if "the kingdom of God" does not mean the church, then let no man quote John 3:5 to prove that a man must be baptized in order to enter into the church.

"In view of these passages and others which might be quoted" we leave it to Bro. Garrison to say whether he still thinks that "the church was born on the Pentecost following Christ's resurrection."

THE GLADSTONE · HUXLEY CONTROVERSY.

DEAN HAGGARD, OF DRAKE UNIVERSITY.
POSSIBLE, OR IMPOSSIBLE?

"Can Genesis and science be compared?"
This is one of the questions in which the parties failed to come to an agreement.
And yet, an agreement is indispensable to the most profitable discussion of this subject. Moreover it is a question whether Prof. Drummond has not played double on this matter. Has he not gone into partnership with Mr. Huxley at one stage of the debate, and then at another has he not disowned his contract?

Mr. Huxley is clear and consistent. He takes the position that science must be compared with science, and that whoever attempts to harmonize Genesis with science is necessarily treating Genesis as science. He utterly repudiates the thought that there is anything at all scientific in Genesis, and hence there can be no comparison. Hear him: "It is Mr. Gladstone and not I who will have it that the Pentateuchal cosmogony is to be taken as science. In spite of all protests to the contrary those who bring it into comparison with science do seek to make a scientific document of it." We may go one step further and ask what it is if it is not science. Here Mr. Huxley does not leave us in doubt for a moment. It is poetry: "As poetry these lines are vivid and admirable; as a scientific statement, which they must be taken to be if any one is justified in comparing them with another scientific statement, they fail to convey any intelligible conception to my mind." make his meaning clear and his logic strong Prof. Huxley not only calls it poetry, but tells us what kind: "The Pentateuchal story of the creation is simply a myth." To sum up, then, it is a mythical poem wholly outside of the scientific realm.

How does Mr. Drummond hold? Is it poetry of the mythical type? Is it impossible to compare it with science? Read his own words: "Absolutely free from natural science" is what he says on p. 211 of Nineteenth Century, 1886. And immediately after he calls it poetry and tells us what kind by likening it to George Macdonald's "Where did you come from, baby, dear?" Since then, both agree that it is poetry of a certain type or genera and that it is not scientific who can be surprised that both come to the same conclusion as stated by George Adam Smith? "He [Prof. Drummond] accepted Mr. Huxley's statement, that it is impossible to harmonize Genesis and science."

The weight of this combination was intended to throw Mr. Gladstone and all "reconcilers" out of court and throw the costs of the case upon him and his friends. See how perfectly it was built to do the work:

"Mr. Gladstone, it is charged that you have compared Genesis with science and that you claim an agreement between the two: is it so?"

"I so claim, good sirs."

"Have you not assumed, then, that Genesis is a scientific document?"

"I have assumed that, though not clothed in the technical language of modern science and too condensed for scientific details, it is of such nature as to be legitimately comparable with natural science."

"Professors Huxley and Drummond, has Mr. Gladstone shown any agreement between Genesis and science?"

"He has not."

"Will you please tell us why he has failed so completely and utterly?"

"He has attempted the impossible. Genesis and science cannot be compared. His failure is therefore not only partial but total. It is absolute."

"We will not hear the case any further. It is thrown out of this court. In the mouth of two witnesses Mr. Gladstone is condemned, and we assess the costs of the case so far to him."

IS ANY MATTER SETTLED UNTIL IT IS SET-TLED RIGHT?

Before a fair court there are phases of this question that prove very troublesome to the allies against Mr. Gladstone.

The one which seems to trouble the biographer of Prof. Drummond more than any other is the attitude of a distinguished scientist, Prof. Haeckel. Though an unbeliever, he sides with Mr. Gladstone and spoils the position of his antagonists! This is very embarrassing to George Adam Smith. Most if not all his readers will feel that he has made a sorry effort in getting around this awkward fact. On p. 38 of Vol. I, Haeckel's History of Creation, you will find these words: "We cannot deny our just and sincere admiration to the magn-ficent understanding of nature displayed by the Jewish lawgiver;" which means that Huxley and Drummond were mistaken and that Gladstone was right in his basal assumption! And that probably his critics were further wrong or overprejudiced in passing sweeping resolutions of absolute failure on his part. Prof. Smith feels the force of this, but does he meet it or turn it aside. "What can be the matter with this singular book?" he asks. "Why is it science to Haeckel one minute and error the next? Why are Haeckel and Mr. Huxley not agreed if it is science? Why are Haeckel and Mr. Gladstone agreed if it is religion? If Huxley does not agree with Haeckel, why does he not agree with Mr. Gladstone?" A wilderness of unanswered questions, surely, but how do they settle the question? What proof that Gladstone and Haeckel are wrong and Huxley and Drummond right? Is it not time to change the question and ask, not what is the matter with this singular book (Genesis), but "what is the matter with this singular lot of philosophers?"

An unbiased court might also ask Prof. Drummond to explain some of his own words. Sometimes such a task is the most trying of all ordeals—especially when these words are presented in "deadly parallels:"

"Absolutely free from natural science." "The whole underlying theory of the reconcilers (the scientific nature of Genesis) is as exploded as Bathybius."

But on this he says: "I write to repudiate their whole position in the name of scientific theology."

"The scientific man must go there (Genesis) to complete his science or it remains forever incomplete."
"And this is the one

"And this is the one high sense in which Genesis can be said to be scientific."

On this side of the parallel he adopts and uses the very essence of the position of the "reconcilers."

I wonder what kind of a solution some of the Pentateachal critics would work out for this problem. If they find a "complete difference" in the laws of firstlings between Deut. 12:6, 17ff. with 15:19ff. on one hand and Num. 18:18 on the other; if the tithe laws in Deut 12:17ff.; 14:22 have no resemblance to those in Num. 18:21-28 and Lev. 27:30-32 how can these statements possibly be harmonized? How can they be attributed to the same man or to the same age? If one is impossible why not the other? Of the two I should name the Drummond problem the harder by far.

Our Budget.

- -Missouri convention Sept. 17-20.
- -Church Extension offerings still in order.
- -This is the last month of our missionary year.
- -It is time to prepare for the General Conventions at Kansas City in October.
- —September has brought us cooler days. It is said that August broke the record for a hot month—in St. Louis.
- —The St. Louis Exposition will soon be open to the public again, with several new attractions, one of which will be Tissott's original paintings of the life of Christ.
- —Great preparations are being made for the Pan American Exposition to open at Buffalo, N. Y., May 1, 1901. In some respects this exposition will equal if not excel any exposition yet held in the United States.
- -W. E. Garrison, of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST staff, has returned from his European tour, but his letters will continue several weeks yet. He is in fine health, and is greatly pleased with his last tour through Europe.
- —The Missionary Intelligencer for September opens with a picture illustrating the difference between applications for a vacant pulpit in this country and applications for work in the field of Foreign Missions. It is needless to say that the contrast is striking. The September number of this magazine is up to its former standard of excellence in its manifold departments.
- —The American Home Missionary for September contains a concert exercise for Boys' and Girls' Rally Day. It has appeared in good season, but none too soon for the occasion. It is a good exercise and needs to be well studied before rendered Send to B. L. Smith, Cor. Sec., Y. M. C. A. Bldz., Cincinnati, Ohio, for what copies you may need.
- —Remember that the 63rd annual convention of the Missouri Christian Co-operation will be held at Moberly Sept. 17-20. The time is short. If you have not already done so, report your name at once to S. B. Moore. If you can come by way of St. Louis and go on the Christian-EvangeList special coach on the Wabash, which leaves Union Station at 9:15 a. m., Monday, Sept. 17th. Send your name for this trip to W. D. Cree, care of this office. Let everybody who can attend this convention. The state of the cause in Missouri demands it.
- —We are now in the midst of Church Extension harvest. It began on last Sunday and will last throughout the month. No congregation should be without a part in this gathering. If you did not make an offering for Church Extension on last Sunday do so at the earliest opportunity. The cause of Church Extension needs your assistance and you need to have a part in this good work. Make an offering and send it at once to G. W. Muckley, Kansas City, Mo.
- —In our note on the population of St. Louis last week we speak of it as the fifth largest city in the United States. We should have said the fourth instead of the fifth.
- —Politics and Religion was announced as the thems for a special service in the Christian Church in Carthage, Ohio. last Sunday night. Such meetings must be upon a purely Christian platform. The party spirit must not be present. No Christian should be the slave of a political party. The Christian should be a free man; neither blind nor bound. He should be able to see things as God sees them and to preach righteousness in every department of life. Righteousness exalts a nation, but only as it is incorporated in the nation's customs and laws.

- —The total receipts for Foreign Missions to September 1st amount to $153,433.96. This is a gain of $23,034.96. The books of the Foreign Society close September 30th.
- —All persons interested in the Bethany C. E. Reading Courses are requested to note that hereafter only one line of study will be taken up at a time. The months of October, November and December will be devoted exclusively to Bible Study; January, February and March to the Study of the Disciples of Christ; April, May and June to the Study of Missions. By taking up one subject at a time the scheme of study is simplified, greater interest may be awakened, and better results secured. For full information concerning these Courses, write to J. Z Tyler, Cleveland, Ohio.
- —The dedication of the new Christian Church at Fairview, five miles south of Pleasantville, Ia., will take place Lord's day, September 9th, at 10:30 A. M., by Dr. H. O. Breeden, of Des Moines. An all-day basket meeting will be held in the grove surrounding the church on that day. The Fairview church is a commodious frame, costing $2,000. Bro. Forrest D. Ferrall, of Pleasantville, Ia., has made this his mission point during the past two years. The brethren are now housed in a good building.
- —A sister who has profited by a tract that fell into her hands thinks that much more good might be done in this way. Those who have more good literature than they can read or use themselves could do a great work by a proper distribution of the same. If no demand for it in your community send it to missions for distribution. Tracts are silent but potent factors for good and thousands of them ought to be kept in circulation from house to house all the time. They are messengers of peace, of comfort, of good news, and of salvation. Put as many such tracts at work as you can. Buy them expressly for this work.
- -B. J. Radford, of Eureka, Ill., and J. J. Harris, of Marion, Ill., whose pictures appear in this paper, are candidates for office on the Prohibition ticket this year. B. J. Radford is candidate for secretary of state and J. J. Harris for lietenant-governor. Those who know these men will certainly have no difficulty with their conscience in voting for them, to say nothing of the cause for which they stand, and as they are well known throughout the state we see no reason why they should not poll a large vote if not secure the offices for which they are named. It is doubtful if a larger per cent. of Prohibitionists are to be found among the preachers of any other religious body than can be found among those of the Disciples of Christ. They are characteristically at the forefront in every essential reform movement, especially those involving the moral interests of the country.
- -Baxter Waters, pastor Central Christian Church, tendered his resignation several weeks ago to take effect Oct. 1. His motive in so doing, as he explained at the time in one of the city dailies, is to secure a pastorate in a smaller city or town where he will have more leisure for study than the care of a large city church allows. In making this announcement of Bro. Waters' resignation it gives us great pleasure to say that he is a young man of superior education and native ability, devout in spirit and of unblemished moral character. His preaching has been of a high order, spiritual in tone, earnest in manner and We believe he has before scriptural in matter. him a career of great usefulness, and we most heartily commend him to the brotherhood generally, and especially to churches in the smaller cities and towns that may be seeking a pastor.

- —The University of Pennsylvania has issued a circular of informatism each, on its courses in "Finance and Economy," "Business and Banking," "Commerce and Industry."
- —In our evangelistic column of August 23 a mistake was made in the report of the work at Exchange, Ill. In abbreviating the report an omission occurred that did njustice to other preachers. The congregation was set in order by C. W. Stevenson, assisted by C. W. Hill and Isaac Brecklehymer. Also it is C. W. Hill instead of L. D. Hill that is preaching at Exchange once a month in co operation with H. N. Hays.
- -We have received a copy of the very suggestive picture published by the American Christian Missionary Society in the interest of the "Boys' and Girls' Rally Day for America" on the Sanday before Thanksgiving. The central figure in the picture is that of a boy behind a pulpit draped in the American flag with open Bible in one hand while pointing to duty with the other. There are numerous appropriate readings on the picture and other features, all of which are intended to call out and emphasize the importance of the day and the duty of the church and to commit the people to action. The picture is on cardboard 10x13. suitable for framing and intended, we presume, to hang on the wall in every Sunday-school room of our churches throughout the land.
- —One of the most interesting and sensible chapters we have yet seen on religious unity appears in this paper. It is by Joseph F. Newton, assistant pastor of the Non-sectarian Church of this city. The freedom of this article from the partisan spirit, cold logic and incriminating accusations makes it soul-refreshing to read.
- -We have received a tract of 16 pages from Dr. H. H. Kane, 138 W. 34th St., New York City, devoted to burial places for dogs, and also to the proper treatment of domestic acimals. Dr. Kane is the treasurer of the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals and would appreciate any contributions to that work. The tract contains several pictures of dog cemeteries, afflicted and abandoned animals, etc. This is all good, but how much more ought such goodness abound toward the afflicted, forsaken, poverty-stricken sufferers of the human family; especially at present, of the famine sufferers in India. We are glad to see the cultivation of kindness toward both animals The cultivation of one ought to beget and man. sympathy for the other.
- -In the settlement of the international tangle between the other powers and China, Li Hung Chang, by reason of his age, his experience in diplomacy, his ability as a statesman, and his influence among the Chinese people, is destined to be the most important factor. The aged viceroy, whose picture we give on the first page, and who has credentials as minister plenipotentiary from the Empress Dowager, is said to be the richest man in China, if not in the world. Gen. Grant, in his tour around the world, made the acquaintance of Earl Li, and pronounced him one of the shrewdest men, and ablest statesman living, comparing him to Bismarck. He subsequently visited this country and had every opportunity for studying Western civilization and comparing it with that of the Orient. When it became apparent in the recent trouble in China that the allied powers would overcome the Boxers and demand indemnity, Li Hang Chang was summoned from the Canton Province of which he is the viceroy, to assist in helping China out of the present grave crisis. He is, no doubt, much more enlightened as to the resources of the European powers and the United States than any other statesman of renown in China. His present relations to the future of China gives him a world wide prominence, and on this account we have thought his picture would be appreciated by our readers.

J. H. Berkey, pastor of the church at Monroe, Wis., has received a two months' vacation from his church, and we judge from what we hear of his work, that he will put in the time in the prohibition field as lecturer. We have received a cir-cular containing some exceedingly complimentary notices of his lectures on this subject.

F. E. Meigs spent Aug 26 with the church in Mankato, Minn., and delivered two fine addresses to large and appreciative audiences. His evening address on "Causes of Conditions in China" passed there and in St. Paul as the ablest word that had been spoken on the question in that part of the country. He is a master of the situation and is doing great good by his discourses

A. M. Harrell, of Farmington, Mo., passed through this city on last Friday on his way to Chandler, Okla., where he preached on last Sunday. Bro Harrell has resigned at Farmington to take effect November 1st, after which date that church will be in need of a pastor. They are building a new church house and expect to lay the cornerstone thereof this week. Bro. Harrell has done a good work for them and adjacent churches and will be greatly missed when he leaves them.

W. J. Russell, pastor of the Church of Christ in Rushville, Ind., preached in the Mt. Cabanne Church, this city, on last Sunday, and it is needless to add, to the delight of those who heard him. Bro. Russell is a man of commanding appearance in the pulpit and always delights his hearers with his thoughtful, finished sermons. Fro. Russell is on a vacation and goes from here to Grand Rapids, Mich., where he will spend the month with his family.

The testimony of so many to the greatness of Alexander Procter's character reminds me that W. H. Mills, a high official of the Southern Pacific Railroad Company, and said to be the brainiest man in it, told me that he admired Alexander Procter more than any man he ever heard. Bro. Procter's influence upon Mr. Mills seemed to have created in him an interest in our whole brotherhood. He heard him at Sacramento several years W. B. BERRY. ago.

San Francisco.

W. H. Waggoner has been disabled from work three weeks on account of an accident, but is again in the field. Two weeks ago he was at Fairview, Mo, last week at Civil Bend and this week at Gaynor, M). He also has dates for Rockfort and Albany in Missouri, and Auburn, Neb., taking all of September. At each of the points where he holds institutes the circulation of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST is enlarged. Bro. Waggoner has no complaint about audiences. He usually has crowded houses. He will be at the General Convention in Kansas City.

In writing of the work at Nevada, Mo., D. D. Boyle says: "Bro. B. F. Hill, the consecrated and tireless worker, closed his pastoral engagement with the church on last Lord's day, August 26. He goes at once into the evangelistic work. Missouri churches know him and we expect to hear of great victories won by him and them. Bro. Edwards, the newly chosen pastor, will begin his work on September the 2nd. He comes highly recommended. We will pray for his success. There are hundreds of corresponding to the contract of the are hundreds of consecrated Christians in this congregation. They have one of the best and most beautiful houses of worship and one of the livest cities in the state. Why not succeed? 'So mote it be.' Nevada, Mo., will be my permanent address in the future."

Alexander Campbell's Theology.

This book, by Winfred Ernest Garrison, published by the Christian Publishing Company, of St. Louis, is to me both a surprise and a delight. It is a surprise that so young a man should write so thoughtful, so matured a book. It is a delight that he has done it. I recall some twenty years ago that this young man, with his older brother, both then kids from seven to ten years old, was playing around in my yard while his parents were spending a few days at my home. It is difficult to realize that I am now reading-have read with interest, and have read a second time-a book written by him. This volume is a valuable and significant contribution to our literature. It will be read with interest and profit by thoughtful men outside our own ranks. The book is an attempt to trace the sources of Alexander Campbell's religious ideas, to understand, in the light of philosophy, his theological views. And the easy, graceful manner in which the author moves about and among the different schools of philosophy and theology indicates a breadth of reading and study and a maturity of thought that is remarkable and inspiring. Every man is the product of the influences that play upon his life and the uses he makes of them. Paul was the product of Greek, Jewish and Christian thought. These several influences received into his life wrought through his individuality and made the Apostle Paul. In the same way Alexander Campbell is the result of his own splendid personality and working through the forces that touched and affected his life. It is this that Mr. Garrison attempts to show. We have had brief efforts by different writers in magazine articles to do something of this sort before. These have been only suggestive of the work done by Mr. Garrison in this volume-Alexander Campbell's Theology. It is a satisfaction to know that we have young men coming up who have the ability and the disposition to think, to look beneath the surface for the forces that produce the phenomena they observe, and to trace present effects back to their original causes.

A dispassionate review of our history, of the teachings of our fathers, a careful sifting of the chaff from the wheat, an elimination of error from the truth, are the things now to be done. This book is a move in that direction and augurs well for the future, both of the author and of the ends toward which it is a contribution.

We shall have more to say about this book later In the meanwhile, let all our preachers, especially our young preachers, who desire to grow up fully equipped for their work, get this book—Alexander Campbell's Theology—and do as I have done, not simply read it, but study it.

Returning to Africa.

Have been in Kansas during the past 10 days. Will visit several of our congregations in Missouri, Illinois and Indiana on my way back to my home at Burgin, Kentucky. More than one year has passed away since leaving Burgin, Ky., on this "Home Mission journey." My expectations now are to reach our mission again at Lagos, West Africa, about the end of the present year. The work at Lagos is still quite hopeful. The native members are doing what they can, but they need very much the help and encouragement of a missionary. Faithfully and truly yours in the one hope,

Two Ways to Help.

J. W. HARDY, CANTON, MO.

Many brethren are interested in Christian University as shown by expressions coming from every part of the state, and the present purpose is to suggest two ways to help the school forward.

The time is near when pupils will determine upon what school to enter, and I give the following clipping to show what the M. E. Church (South) is asking of their ministers. We have 800 Christian ministers in Missouri. Surely, none of these would make a mistake in influencing a pupil to attend Christian University. Now is the time to act. Let the ministry give us their support and the problem will soon be solved as regards full attendance and good endowment of Christian University. Here is the clipping mentioned above, taken from the Texas Christian Advocate, and concerns a school in that state:

Next year ought to open with five hundred (500) pupils. We have over seven hundred (700) traveling preachers in Texas, and if each of them would make special efforts to send one boy from his charge to Georgetown, just see what a company of students would be at the university at the next opening. And we verily believe that there is not a pastoral charge in Texas but will send a boy to our central school if the preacher will put himself to a little trouble to hunt up said boy and give him proper encouragement. All you will have to do as you go about your work is to keep your eyes open, and when you see a bright Methodist boy spend the night with his parents and talk education to him. That sort of work on the part of pastors has brought into our schools the best brains in the church and in the state. Through this sort of work Holland N. McTyeire was picked up out of a country home and sent to Randolph-Macon College. Our great commonwealth has hundreds of hardy and stalwart boys throughout her homes if we will only search them out and point them toward the advantages of Christian education at Georgetown. They are ours; we ought to educate them according to our ideas of Christian training. Therefore, let every preacher get him a catalogue from the Southwestern, carry it around his work with him and use it when opportunity offers. Such work most surely will bear fruit for the benefit of the church in years to come.

The second way to help is indicated in the letter given below. It needs no comment. The books are valuable and are already in the library of the university:

H. J. MCROBERTS, Canton, Mo.—Dear Brother: Our family have made arrangements to move from Palmyra, and we have quite a large portion of my grandfather's—Jacob Creath's—library, which would be quite a burden to move and we have decided to offer it to Christian University if the board will bear the trouble and expense of moving it. None of us have the time or the opportunity to read the works, and we thought it would be of greater benefit to C. U. than any one else; in fact, Bro. Errett suggested this disposition of it to us when he left here.

You lay the matter before those interested and let us know in the next week or two. . . .

With kindest regards, and awaiting your reply, I am yours very truly, P. C. SMITH.

Illinois Notes.

The State Jubilee Convention is at Bloomington, October 2, 3, 4.

The convention begins first day, Tuesday, at 10 A. M., and we shall need your presence from that hour.

Judge C. J. Scofield, Herbert L. Willett, B. F. Jacobs, W. S. Carter, editor of the Locomotive Fireman's Magazine, and many other prominent men will address the convention. The C. W. B. M. section of the program is splendid.

The great coliseum building will be used for the larger sessions and it seats 3,500 people. It will be full several times. Come early and get a chair.

The Western Passenger Association grants a one and one-third fare on its lines on the certificate plan. Take a certificate for each ticket purchased, get it countersigned by the railroad secretary and you can return at one cent a mile. This applies only in cases where tickets cost more than fifty cents. Consult your agent always before starting. Tickets can be bought three days before the convention and on through it, good to return up to and including the 6th.

The Central Passenger Association grants a one-fare rate and will sell tickets on its lines October 1st and 2nd only, good to return up to and including the 6th. Buy a round trip ticket if possible. Be sure to consult the agent at each point where you buy a ticket.

A card of complete instructions is sent to each church and also a large poster to hang up in the building. Kindly advertise.

The Bloomington church will give lodging and breakfast free, other meals to be taken down town.

Notify Brother T. M. Clarke, Bloomington, of your coming that you may be assigned.

The route for Illinois people to Kansas City is the Chicago & Alton. Special trains will run.

From the Keystone State.

Herewith I propose to give a "bird's-eye view" of the state of things as they exist in the district embracing Bradford, Tioga and Sullivan Counties, Pa. And first I call attention to the convention of Disciples of Christ held recently in our village, Le Roy. It was largely attended, weather fine, worship spiritual, preaching evangelical and business transactions harmonious. brotherly love and union prevailed, and the whole was spiritually enjoyable. It was remarked that it was one of the best conventions ever held in those regions. Brothers C. L. Morrison, of Elmira, N. Y., H. F. Lutz, of Harrisburg, Pa., and C. W. Harvey, of Plymouth, Pa., were present as well as others from abroad whose helpful aid added to the interest of the convention.

OUR WORK AT LE ROY.

Church work and interest are forward moving. We have had six additions recently; one from the Free Baptists and one from the Missionary Baptists. We feel sure others will follow. Good audiences attend our preaching service. Outlook is fair. During months of July and August Baptists and Disciples hold union services on Lord's day evenings. Baptist pastor speaks in Disciples' house and writer in Baptists'. It manifests a brotherly and unifying spirit.

OUR HEALTH PRECARIOUS.

The work of this large church, with widely scattered membership, besides publishing a paper in the interests of the same, is proving too much for the writer. We have been overworked, and we are seriously considering the matter of retiring from this large and active pastoral work. Apparently it will be a necessity. If we are constrained to do so it will not be of choice, but of necessity. By the time this may be in print the writer will have been forty five years in the active ministerial work, with only brief intermissions, and has now passed the sixty-fifth milestone of life. If we retire from the active pastorate, if able to do so and openings prevail we shall not be altogether idle, but shall yet do more work for the Master. The ministry is a great and fearfully responsible work. We love to engage therein. To be soul, winners and savers for God—oh! it's the greatest of all works to which men and women can be called to perform. May we all honor this heavenly calling.

WORKERS IN THE FIELD.

Bro. H. C. Maltman is doing good work at Sayre-Pa.

Church work goes forward encouragingly at East Smithfield under the labors of Elder L. J. Reynolds.

Bro. E. F. Randall is earnestly at work at Troy, Pa., and we hear good reports from his labors.

Bro. W. I. Burreli is doing good work at Sylvania, Pa.

Bro. R. E. Jope, late from South Gardiner, Maine, has assumed charge of the church at Alba, Pa. We hope to hear good reports from his charge.

Bro. H.F. Keltch is meeting with success at Granville Center, Pa.

Bro. L. O. Newcomer is succeeding admirably at Canton, Pa. He has regular additions to his church.

Bro. F. E. Spooner is actively at work at Grover and Hillsgrove, Pa., and succeeding well.

Bro. J. H. Gordonier, of Troy, Pa, now shepherds the fleck at Union.

Bro. F. J. M. Appleman is doing good work at Covington, Pa., and at a few other places. He reports occasional additions.

Bro. J. W. Bolton has met with good success at Sweet Valley and Huntsville, Pa. He baptized a number recently, and has access in regularly.

Other ministers are doing some work in our district, and the outlook is quite favorable for aggressive work.

A NEW PAPER.

Star of the East, is now being published. It may be properly denominated the official organ of the Disciples of Christ in the East Pennsylvania district. Is published monthly. Price twenty cents a year. H. F. Lutz, of Harrisburg, Pa., editor. It's a spicy and well-edited paper.

And Bro. C. C. Newcomer publishes a monthly, the Sunbeam, in the interest of the Church of Christ in Canton, Pa., while the writer of these lines publishes the Le Roy Messenger, a monthly, in the interest of the Church of Christ at Le Roy, Pa. Thus we propose to do good. Here we drop the pen. Praternally yours,

R. H. BOLTON.

Le Roy, Pa., July 30, 1900.

In the June number of "The Pulpit" Sherman Hill, pastor of the Church of Christ in Hamp ton, Iowa, has a sermon on "An Enlarged Vision." Bro. Hill is a vigorous thinker and writer, and after whom it is a pleasure to read. In the same magazine Rev. W. I. Carroll has an address on the death of D. L. Moody beginning as follows:

There was a man sent from God whose name was D. L. Moody. He was as the voice of one crying in the wilderness:—"Prepare ye the way of the Lord, make his paths straight" and he stood and cried: "Behold the Lamb of God, which taketh away the sin of the world." He was a burning and a shining light, and I tell you that among those born of women there hath not arisen a greater prophet since the days of Paul, the Apostle, in the time of the long ago. "And he was not; for God took him," took him at high noon, December 22nd, 1899.

To the Churches of Oklahoma.

The territorial convention will meet with the church at Guthrie during the last week in September-Sept. 25, 26 and 27. This church extends a hearty invitation to all of the churches of the territory. Each church in Oklahoma should be represented in this convention. Let this be the greatest convention in our history.

The church at Guthrie offers free entertainment to all who wish to attend this convention. Our homes will be open and we wish to see you and to entertain you. Will you come? If so, will you kindly send your name to me at once. and oblige Entertainment at our National Convention.

The Christian Churches of Kansas City extend a cordial invitation to their brethren everywhere to attend the convention in this city. October 11-18. Guided by the experience of previous entertainment committees, no assignments will be sent out by mail except to those who engage hotel accommodations in advance. All others will be assigned to homes upon their arrival in the city. Delegates will be met at the depots by members of the reception committee and directed to convention headquarters, at the First Christian Church, 11th and Locust Streets. Here they will be enrolled and at once assigned to their homes, pages being provided to assist them in finding the same. It is very desirable, however, that all who intend coming shall notify the committee, so that they may know how many homes to provide. Those who send in their names will be given first consideration, and so far as possible will have their quarters selected for them in advance. Delegates wishing hotel accommodations will please examine the following list and write at once to the committee. State what or what priced hotel you prefer and for how many persons, men or women, and for how many and what days of the convention you wish accommodations. The committee will take pleasure in promptly securing them for you. Rates are on the American plan in all cases except the two specified in the list.

From Hillsbury to Halifax.

At this writing I am on the Cobiguid Mountains of Nova Scotia, my native province, where it is delightfully cool. These mountains overlook Northumberland Strait, and from some of their highest peaks I can "survey the landscape o'er" for nearly fifty miles in several directions. On the south I can see the muddy waters of the Bay of Fundy, and on the north the clear waters of Northumberland Strait, and beyond that, in the dim distance, I can see the hills of Prince Edward Island, the gem of the Gulf of St. Lawrence and the garden spit of the Dominion of Canada. The scene is enchanting, and doubly so to one who roamed over these mountains and through these forests when we were but a boy. forty-five years ago. What a change has taken place since then! It is true, the same rock-ribbed hills and mountains are here that my feet pressed when I was a boy, but where are the old familiar faces and the companions of my youth? They are nearly all gone. Many of them rest beneath the sod, while many more of them are to be found in different parts of "the states." Only here and there do I meet a person that I know or that ever knew me. I am almost a stranger in my native land, where I grew to manhood!

Well, it will be seen by this letter that I am somewhat on the wing. I am on these mountains taking a few days of much-needed rest. Before I stop I expect to land in Halifax. Now I know that, at the mention of Halifax, a broad smile will play upon the countenance of more than one American, and vet, if asked why he smiles, he would be unable to answer. Halifax is not a very hot place in any sense. There are hundreds of hotter towns in "the states" than conservative old Halifax. A man that can stand the moral temperature of St. Louis or Chicago need have no fears in going to Halifax. He doubtless would find the change beneficial. But this, by the way.

On the 16th day of July I left Hillsbury, a small village in the midst of a beautiful farming community of well-to-do Christian people, mostly from the Highlands of Scotland, fifty miles northwest of the city of Toronto. Not until within a few days of leaving had I matured my plans to come as far East as the maritime provinces. After spending a day in Toronto, making some preparations for my journey, which was to be across Lake Ontario and down the noble St. Lawrence to Quebec, I took passage on the steamer Persia, plying between Toronto and Montreal. I found myself unable to cross the ocean this summer and visit Paris. But a trip on these inland waters and a visit to old Quebec and Halifax was now within my reach. and so, like Garfield when he chose the canal be cause he could not reach the lake, I chose these because I could not reach that. Everybody in Toronto seemed to be going somewhere to get out of the intense heat, which seemed to be about as oppressive in Toronto and Canada in general as it usually is in "the states." But when we were once out on the broad lake with its cool waters and refreshing breeze we bade farewell to every fear-except the fear of not being able to get to the first table at meal time, on account of the great crowd of passergers on board our boat. Our trip across the lake was in the night, which prepared us to enjoy more fully the good things to come in passing down the wonderful St. Lawrence.

At eight o'clock in the morning we reached old Kingston, one of the historic cities of Canada, and situated on the lake where all the waters of these quiet inland seas form themselves into the mighty St. Lawrence before commencing their sublime march to the sea. Kingston, with its military college, its massive gray stone forts, its Martello towers and its imposing public buildings may be fitly called the Woolwich or West Point of Canada.

Leaving Kingston we leave the broad expanse of water belonging to Lake Ontario and enter at once the head of the St. Lawrence River and begin at once to pass in and out among the numerous islands comprising the Thousand Islands. Captain Scott of our steamer told me there were about fifteen hundred islands in all in the group. I had read many descriptions of the Thousand Islands and the scenery of this great river, but not until I saw them for myself did I fully realize the grandeur or how impossible it is to make people fully understand that which they have never looked upon with their own eyes. I had to exclaim in my delight, as I passed through this wonderful scenery: "The half was never told!" For hours our boat steamed through these waters, while all on board gazed at these numerous islands, some them too small even for a humble cottage, while others were large enough for stately mansions, and a few large enough for farming purposes. Here many of the money-kings have their summer residences. Among these we had pointed out to us the princely mansion of the Vanderbilts and that of the present governor of New York.

The little lips are always puck ered to give or take a kiss. In homes where there are children, love reaches In homes its fairest and sweetest proportions. childless homes the kiss of wife and husband grows formal, and presently is neglected; the springs of love in the heart become choked for want of use and exercise. Childlessness is a great sorrow to many women. It is like a curse from Nature, who bids all creatures to be fruitful. It is not a curse but a misfortune. Often the conditions which cause childlessness are removable. Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription has brought joy to many a woman by giving her the happiness of motherhood. It gives to the womanly organs vigor and vitality, removes local obstructions, and practically does away with the pains and pangs of maternity.

Uncle Sam owns a share in this great river and its numerous islands, from the lake down to the city of Cornwall, a little more than half way down to Montreal. After that it entirely belongs to the Canadians until it is finally lost in the waters of the gulf. A school teacher from Toronto, on our way down the river, asked the captain of our boat what the name of the American town was just across the river opposite Montreal. His answer made her wiser, so far as the dividing line between the state of New York and Canada is concerned, if not a happier woman. But I must close for the present, as this letter is already too long.

The Lands of the Long Day-IX.

THE LAND OF A THOUSAND LAKES.

What a blessed thing is a road when you want to go somewhere. It is a modern commonplace to say that telegraphs and railroads are the bonds of steel that hold the world together. So they are. But in the absence of railroads any sort of road, even a crooked cart-track through the forest, serves to bind a remote community to the civilized world. Never did I appreciate the significance of a common country road as an instrument of civilization more than when emerging at Kittila from the roadless wilderness of Lapland. I saw a road leading south. It was narrow, crooked, hilly and stony, but for me it was a highway straight to the centers of the world's life.

As has already been stated, Lapland has no fixed boundaries. For myself, I consider that I left Lapland at this point because from here it was possible to travel by more usual and less adventurous methods and because the people south of here are not Lapps but Finns. Besides, it was here that I saw the sun set for the first time since crossing the Arctic Circle on the west coast of Norway. It slid down with an acute angle with the horizon which it touched a little west of north, about half past eleven and left at midnight a brilliant crimson glow like a summer sunset in the place where the aurora borealis ought to be. There was no more midnight sun for me, but it was several nights later before there was anything that could be called even dusk.

From Kittila the road leads due south two hundred miles along the Kemi River to the town of Kemi, which is at the top of the Gulf of Bothnia, and all along this road there are regular posting stations at intervals of eight or ten miles, where one can secure horses and vehicles, food by day and a bed by night. There is only one real village on the whole route, but farm houses are scattered along all the way, becoming more numerous and more prosperous in appearance as one goes south. The posting stations are simply farm houses like the rist, whose proprietors have entered into an agreement with the government to keep a certain number of horses ready for the use of travelers at a specified rate, a trifle under five cents a mile per each horse, including vehicle and driver. At each station there is a register or "daybook" in which the traveler inscribes his name, residence, profession, last point of departure, immediate destination, the number of horses he wants and any complaints he may have to make. There, too, he finds the official statement of the distance to the next station and the amount he is to pay. The whole thing is very well ordered and there is little chance for a misunderstanding The people along this route, being simple peasants, speak only Finnish, but a single word of that language is all that the traveler absolutely needs. If he can shout "hevonen!" (horse) in a sufficiently imperative tone he will get along. If he can add a few words meaning "immediately," "hurry up," "right away," so much the better, for they are a notoriously deliberate folk (though not quite so slow as the Lapps, I admit), and may consume an hour and a half in changing horses. A phrase or two will enable him to get a bed at night, and a very few additional words will enable him to call for anything to eat which they are likely to have.

A few words ought to be said here about the Finnish language. It is an interesting and an awful thing. I met a German who has been in business twenty years in the capital of Finland who does not know a word of it and will not learn it. He considers it too high a price to pay for the business which he would be able to do in that tongue. It is not allied to any other European language except Magyar; has few grammatical constructions similar to those which are used in Aryan languages, and has no words cognate with English, German or French, and none derived from Latin or Greek, except a few new words like "telegraph" and "bicycle." It has almost no prepositions, but inflects its nouns through sixteen cases and two numbers by the addition of suffixes, and the conjugation of its verbs is as complicated and as full of surprises as the weak verb in Hebrew. Withal, its vocabulary is singularly rich. There is a copious supply of synonyms, and you can learn a dozen names for a thing and still not know the particular one which is used when you most need to understand it. Taking it altogether, I am inclined to believe that that authority on Finnish grammar is correct who calls it the most difficult language in Europe with the possible exception of the unimportant Basque. The only redeeming feature of it, from the standpoint of the learner, is that its words, though long, are easily pronounced and generally distinctly ennunciated by the natives. In the name "Kittila," for instance, they would invariably pause an instant on the first syllable to indicate the doubling of the t. English is certainly the most slovenly of languages as regards pronunciation, and I am inclined to put Finnish at the other extreme.

The first condition of any correct understanding of the people of Finland is to avoid two popular misconceptions: First, that they are a kind of Eskimo, and second, that they are a species of Russian. To be sure, a part of their land runs into the Arctic Zone, but they are no frozen savages, clad in furs and living in ice huts. They are a civilized people with schools, churches and homes, with industries and arts and with a national literature, including an epic poem which Prof. Max Muller ranks among the five great epics. Though allied to the Lapps in race and language, and intermingled with them in the far north, the Finns are a far superior people. And there is no more affinity between Finns and Russians in blood or speech than there is between the Bushmen and the Boers

Just where the Finns and their kinsmen originally came from is one of the unsettled questions of ethnology, but it is pretty well agreed that they were the original inhabitants of what is now Russia. As the Anglo-Saxon invasion of Britain drove the Celts into the corners while they still maintain their racial separateness as Welsh, Irish and Highland Gælic, so the invasion of Russia by the Slavs (the modern Russians) pushed the Finns into the northwest corner and the Magyars into the southwest. The noteworthy fact is that the Finns, although driven into this somewhat remote region, battered back and forth by Sweden and Russia, attached at last to Russia as an independent grand-duchy, and with every prospect of sharing the political fate of Poland and the Baltic Provinces, have developed and maintained a degree of civilization in many respects superior to that of any other group of the czar's subjects.

But enough of ethnology, for the horse and cart are waiting, ready to continue the journey southward. The Finnish cart is a curious affair. I do not know that it has any other virtues. It is a two-wheeler with a box bed and usually with two seats. There are practically no springs—sometimes actually none. The light and jaunty construction which is exhibited in the Norwegian road-carts plays no part here, for while the former often resemble an antiquated racing-gig, the latter not infrequently suggest a small ashcart. The boy who drives sits on the back seat if there are two; and the horse, encumbered by only the most elementary harness, strolls along the bumpy road with a feigned air of great weariness. Anon the boy rises up from behind like an apparition and beats the dashboard with the end of the rope reins-which is as far as they will reach. The astute horse knows to an inch how far that rope will come, but he gives three terrified jumps to gratify the boy, then relapses into his former gait. The reader will understand that it required traveling not less than fifteen hours a day and the exercise of much persuasion on both boy and horse to accomplish a daily average of nearly seventy miles with a series of such equipages as this.

I have spoken of the driver as a boy. So he was usually, and as a rule a very small boy. But I have had drivers of both sexes and of all ages, from seven to seventy. The younger they were the better for my purposes. With any one under ten I stood a fair chance of overruling their natural Finnish deliberateness—a trait which develops and solidifies very early in life—and bulldozing them into making haste. There was one little mite of a girl, barefooted and sunbonneted (this was still north of the polar circle), who was the most satisfactory driver of them all, for she gladly turned over the reins to me when I suggested it and we made time that stage.

On another day, after traveling all morning in the rain, I was detained nearly two hours at a station where their horses were all out and I went into the main room to dry my clothes by the open fire. There was a man there sewing with an American sewing machine; and a burly young woman who was busied about various dainty household duties, wore boots, smeked a pipe and spat through her teeth with frequency and precision. Leaving that same station my driver was jolly, round-faced girl of about seventeen ressed in yellow tarpaulin (for it was still raing) she looked more like a sailor than anything se. She would have been a good one, too; she as active enough in leaping in and out of the art.

It is true-more seriously true than the reader ill perhaps appreciate in this connection-that here are few countries in which woman is more noroughly "emancipated" than in Finland. The ational University opened its doors to women ng before any German university took that step, nd nowhere are the trades and professions open both sexes on more equal terms. It is not a uestion of men putting upon their wives and aughters manual labor in the fields and streets s in many places on the continent; but enterrising and self-dependent women choose callings which would surprise even the most advanced mong us. They are plumbers, carpenters, utchers, house and sign painters, bricklayers. have seen them roofing houses, working as ection hands on the railroad and loading teamers.

Gradually, as one descends the valley of the Kemi River, the landscape loses the last vestiges f its Lappish character. Whereas there had een only occasional patches of potatoes, there re now fields of grain and grass. The trees are arger and much timber is being rafted down the iver. Houses are more frequent and the whole spect of the country is more genial. At the end f the second day I crossed the Arctic Circle at he village of Rovaniemi, and at the end of the hird day came in sight of the Gulf of Bothnia. The neck of the Scandinavian Peninsula had been crossed. Those who do not like figures may skip the following, but it may interest some to know that the distance, by my route, from Vadso on the Arctic Ocean to Kemi on the Gulf of Bothnia via Seida, Utsjoki, Enare and Kittila, was 540. Of this distance 40 miles was traveled by wheel. 125 miles by canoe, 175 miles on foot and 200 miles by horse and cart.

After reaching the gulf my progress through Finland was, of necessity, much more hurried than I could have wished. A little jerk-water paddlewheel steamer plies in eight hours from Kemi to the important Finnish city of Uleaborg, following the coast most of the way and stopping at numerous ports which owe their existence solely to the timber trade. The trip was memorable because the captain of the boat, who had lived ten years in Chicago, spoke the first fluent English I had heard for weeks; and because I obtained on the boat the first warm meal I had found in sixteen days, with the exception of those at Enare.

Uleaborg is a flourishing port which makes its living chiefly by the export of lumber and tar, two of Finland's chief products. The tar is brought down the Ulea River in long cances, each manned by two men who are said to exhibit marvelous dexterity in shooting the celebrated rapids of this stream. I went up the river far enough to come down one set of rapids in a tarboat to see what it was like, but it struck me as being decidedly tame. They say the rapids farther up the stream are larger, swifter and in every way more harrowing, and it must be true, for one hears more about the rapids and tarboais of the Ulea River than any other sight in the country.

Here begins the railroad and, being now without a wheel, I am compelled to adopt that commonplace mode of travel. But the Finnish railways themselves present some interesting points. The main lines are all owned and operated by the government and the fares are probably the lowest in the world. One can go from Uleaborg to Helsingfors, 466 miles, for the equivalent of three dollars and forty cents, or about seventenths of a cent a mile. On round-trip tickets and circular tickets (on which the traveler returns to his starting-point by a different route) the rate is still lower. The engines burn wood, and consequently the cars are quite as clean as the average house. The distance between stations is generally just a trifle more than the length of the train; that is to say, they seem absurdly close together, considering the sparsity of the population. It is noticeable, too, that most of the villages are back from the railroad, indicating that they did not spring up along the line of the road, but that they were there first and the railroad came as near as it could while keeping a reasonably straight course. About once in two hours there is a stop of fifteen minutes for refreshments; and the Finnish railway station dining rooms are perhaps the point at which that country is farthest in advance of the civilized world.

During the trip to Helsingfors I became acquainted with a gentleman who is an "Inspector of National Schools" for a certain district, and he unfolded to me the scheme of education in vogue here. I shall not repeat it, but it is very complete, and the result of it is that no country in Europe has a smaller per cent. of illiteracy. The teaching of mechanical trades and handicrafts was introduced in the Finnish public schools before our first manual training school was established, and for this feature of their educational system, as exhibited at the Paris Exposition, they have recently received a high award. A comparison: In Finland there is one elementary school to every thousand of the population; in Russia a dozen years ago it was found that only thirty per cent. of the conscripts for the army could read and write their own names.

This same inspector told me that his brother was "head gardener for the state railroads. That seemed to me a curious office. He explained that the railroad maintained a large nursery, from which shrubbery and flowers were distributed to the various station masters for the beautifying of their stations. That accounted for the fact that every station yard was like a little park.

Helsingfors, the capital of Finland and the seat of the National University (with 1,800 students), is a handsomely built city of a hundred thousand, with a beautiful and capacicus harbor on the Gulf of Finland. In language it seems to be about equally divided between Finnish and Swedish. All public signs are printed in these two languages and Russian; it is merely official. Much German is spoken in business circles, and a little English.

They are a wonderfully patriotic people, these Finlanders, and they were very gloomy over the recent suppression of their papers by the Russian censor and the prospect of a speedy and forcible Russification of Finland. Every one talked politics freely and every one spoke a good word for the czar who, it is said, means well, but is deceived by his ministers. They are not the people to resist by force. They see too clearly how foolish and futile that would be. But they are grieving for their country as for one dead. I would speak to them of the beauty of their land, its great resources, the intelligence and hospitality of its people; but the answer always came back in one form or another: "Yes, but there is Russia, and it will go hard with Finland."

NOT ALTOGETHER IN HIS STEPS.

I am astonished beyond measure at Mr. Sheldon, an American minister in whom I ardently believe as a profoundly sincere and earnest man of God and as one of the most indefatigable reformers of the time. His books created a perfect craze in England, but like every other mania this literary furore very suddenly subsided. For several weeks I could see scarcely any book in the hands of readers of all classess except "In His Steps; or, What Would Jesus Do?" Then came a stream of other booklets from Mr. Sheldon's pen. But the publishers made the blunder of reprinting these stories by the million, and they became a drug in the market. Now by this time not a soul in the British Isles seems to remember that Mr. Sheldon is an author. But, of course, there was a strong spasm of revived interest created by his sudden appearance on our shores, in connection with the grand Christian Endeavor Convention. Thousands of intelligent and interested people have flocked to various meetings at which Mr. Sheldon was announced to appear And all were in a sense gratified, and in another sense disappointed. They were pleased with the satisfaction of curiosity; but they unanimously agreed that Mr. Sheldon was in himself utterly uninteresting. He is one of the very poorest of public speakers. Nobody would consider him a stirring preacher or feel the slightest desire to hear him a second time. He is a typical illustration of the ease by which a man may happen to become famous by making a single adventitious hit. But he well deserves his fame, and I hope it will increase. His motives are exalted and his conduct is full of the spirit of self-sacrifice. But now I come to deal with what has excited much astonishment and not a little indignation. I will briefly detail the effect of Mr. Sheldon's criticism of England.

SHELDON'S UNCHARITABLENESS.

Mr. Sheldon has been greatly glorified in this country. He had a royal reception wherever he went. But it appears that poor old England has not much p'eased him. Telegrams are coming across giving us the synopsis of his description of us as a people to which he treated the Kansan people, in a Topeka journal, as soon as he had arrived home. I very much wish to see that issue of the Topeka paper. The summary of his communication which has been cabled over gives, I take it, a true condensation of Sheldon's impressions. Assuming the summary to be a fair oae, I have no hes tation in saying that a more uncharitable verdict was never written by a visitor concerning his hosts. Mr. Sheldon, it appears, says that he and Mrs. Sheldon were repeatedly insulted by drunken soldiers, and that those who saw the insults offered evinced no disposition to protest. He also complains that intoxicants were set before him in nearly every house he visited. He does not go so far as to say that his hosts insisted on pouring the liquor down his throat. Then Mr. Sheldon proceeds to say: "If England goes to destruction within the next century it will not be because of war or of danger from other nations, but because she has drunk herself to destruction." Now, I must periously ask how Mr. Sheldon managed to arrive at this conclusion? What are his proofs? Where and for how long did he study the problem? Are his general conclusions as true as the charges against the British soldiers? If so, then I boldly impeach them as being gross and unjust exaggerations. I have for some time regarded Mr. Sheldon as an incarnate nyperbole. His most famous booklet made a sensation because it was a most sensational exaggeration of the Christian Socialist doctrine, thrown into the form of a fascinating religious romance. Even worldly people felt a little pious when reading "In His Steps," and they read a good book without inflicting penance upon themselves, for they could be both amused and excited, having their hearts tearfully stirred at the same moment. But, to be frank, there is a lack of solid sense in Mr. Sheldon's books which robs them of all practical and permanent value. I should like to catechise Mr. Sheldon. It would be a pleasure to cross examine him. We are a nation of nearly forty millions of people, crowded in these little British Isles. Of course, there are many, many, very many people here who are not quite admirable in their lives. So there are in America and other lands. But in America people are more scattered and the questionable characters do not so conspicuously come under notice. There is more room for them to hide away. Evil in England is more conspicuous. But here we have a flying tourist who comes to our land for a few weeks to qualify himself for a sweeping categorical verdict on the nation and its destiny. According to the well known law of tourists he begins, after a visit of a month, entirely taken up with meetings, to write a history of England, including a dogmatic forecasting of the future. Would Mr. Sheldon oblige us with the time, place and nature of these "repeated insults" by a drunken soldiery? I have lived in two important garrison towns for years before I settled again in my native London, and I know the British soldier fairly well. And I firmly believe that he is the best soldier in the world in character and in behavior. My testimony is this, that a soldier in this country, whether sober or intoxicated, never does insult a respectable citizen, and even in rows with roughs the civilians almost invariably begin the trouble. Added to this there is the awkward fact-so far as Mr. Sheldon's argument is concerned -that there are pickets and policemen in the streets as well as soldiers, and if those insults were repeatedly given and the soldiers were drunk, what was Mr. Sheldon about that he did not as a gentleman protect his wife from such behavior by appealing to the police? Our English policemen are the admiration of the whole country. And not of Englishmen only. Again and again have American ladies and gentlemen expressed to me their appreciation of the manners and conduct of the English constabulary. To none of these matters would I have spontaneously alluded. But though I do not fill these letters with any high alutin pæans of my own country, am bound to vindicate common sense in the face sheer nonsensical rhodomontade. To pour out buckets of indiscriminate censure, and thus to create in the min is of the American readers a miserable and groundless prejudice, is not what Jesus would do. Mr. Sheldon had no opportunity to study one-millionth part of this country during his exciting gallop around a few spots. He should come over here in disguise and live here twenty years He would just begin to know a very little about my wonderful country by that time, but he would then feel his ignorance to be so dense that he would only with difficulty be induced to write any judgments at all; but if he did pen any they would be highly flattering instead of shamefully depreciating and disparaging. should like to ask what you, Bro. Garrison, who lived a whole year in England, think of Sheldon's apologia damnosa pro patria mea? And what have Bros. W. T. Moore, J. J. Haley, J. M. Van Horn, A. Martin, Foster, Hodkinson, Buckingham, Earl, Richardson, Assiter, Anderson and others to say who know England infinitely better than Sheldon possibly can? True, he was for a brief period sixteen years before visiting this land. I do not say that Mr. Sheldon formed no correct impressions and that he is altogether ignorant with respect to it; but I do say that I believe many Americans whom I personally know and many who intimately know both countries are infinitely more competent to form a judgment. I earnestly hope that they will deliver it. It is of the utmost importance that England should enjoy the esteem of America. These two nations are destined before long to face the whole world. That is my profound conviction as I have stated over and over again in these same letters.

MY FRIEND, W. H. WINSOR, OF CEDAR RAPIDS.

With extreme interest I have read in the CHRISTIAN EVANGELIST of July 26 the letter of Bro. W. H. Winsor, expressing his disagreement with me in political conclusions. This gentleman asks me why should large, strong nations ignore the Golden Rule and rob the smaller nations right and left rather than for a large, strong individual to play the bully and ignore the rights of weaker neighbors. I honor the high principle which Bro. Winsor exalts as the only true standard of national righteousness. But my American friend writes briefly and leaves me to supply an important ellipsis. Of course, I may take it for granted that the allusion is to two great nations, England and America. Each is constantly indicted as a bullying Goliath. America has trampled on Spain, so an American lady in London indignantly assured me the other day; and another American lady, and a very pious and intelligent one, endorsed the accusation against her country. I feebly attempted to defend Pres. McKinley, but these two clever and eloquent women would have none of my apologetics on behalf of their own country. I had to give it up. I thought America might be left to take care of itself, and I hope McKinley will survive. I was chatting a few days ago with Dr . George Lorimer, of Boston. He told me he considered Pres. McKinley a splendid man, and that he intended to vote for him. But I note that Americans are divided somewhat seriously. I should have little hope for the life and destiny of the country if they were not. I should despair of England if there were no live and conflicting currents of public opinion. But I apprehend that poor Spain in her blind and passionate bigotry flew at America and brought on herself the just wrath of the American people, who had surely been longsuffering and patient for years. I may be wrong, as Bro. Winsor says that he may. We are both modest enough to disclaim pretensions to infallibility. Now, I am convinced that my country had absolutely no choice or latitude of policy with regard to this appalling Boer war. Surely, Bro. Winsor has not read the antecedent history or he would know that it was the smaller people who bullied and were tolerated to an amazing degree. There was no limit at all to the effrontery of the Boers. But that was endured. The Jameson raid is constantly admitted to have been inexcusable. But even that was the sad effort of a shocking set of causes deliberately and wickedly sustained by the corrupt ring round Kruger. I cordially invite any evidence that America bullied Spain, or that England bullied the Boers. I am acquainted with no such evidence. But I am prepared to give voluminous proofs that the bullying on the other side was protracted and incorrigible. By some strange fatality those little nations which go on for years goading, insulting and irritating great powers come to think at last that the latter are big, cowardly bullies, whom it is their du v to whip. There is, then, no restraining them. When the little bully declares war, after launching an insulting ultimatum, would Mr. Winsor tell us that the mighty empire is to go down on its knees in the mire of imperial humiliation and abject apologetics? Britain was not prepared for war with the Boers and never intended war. If the theory is set up that England had no right to any place in South Africa, I will not contend with any who enunciate such a doctrine. Perhaps the British Empire is only worthy of the "universal smash" predicted for it in some quarters. But I never seem to be able to get at any intelligible theory as to what else England or America could have done. Like Bro. Winsor. I am open to con-WILLIAM DURBAN.

43 Park Road, South Tottenham, London, Aug. 17, 1900.

[We have not seen Mr. Sheldon's criticisms of England. We judge, however, from what our correspondent says that Mr. Sheldon has made the mistake which many Americans make in visiting England and which many Englishmen make in visiting America, namely, of forming a judgment on too short an acquaintance and with too limited a knowledge of the people and with their peculiar conditions of life. Mr. Sheldon is too conscientious a man, we are sure, to intentionally do injustice to the people of any nation. He has probably failed to understand the English people and has probably written too hastily. A nearly two years' residence in England greatly modified our earlier impressions of the people and their customs and gave us a much higher estimate of them. - EDITOR.

B. B. Tyler's Letter.

A MAJESTIC LIFE.

In the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST of June 28th the passage of Mother Toof from her beautiful home n New Haven to the house not made with hands was briefly noted.

A character so pure, and sweet, and strong deerves more than a passing notice. Thinking that recital of some of the principal facts in her ong life and the naming of some of her most rominent characteristics may be helpful, I have lecided to devote this letter to this noble Chrisian woman.

I could not be eloquent if I would: I would not be, in this case, if I could. My tribute to the nemory of this mother in Israel is a simple and ondensed recital of facts and the naming of raits. The life itself was more truly eloquent han any possible combination of words can be.

The word "majestic" is used with deliberation n this connection. No other single word so excelly and fully expresses my conception of the haracter of Mrs. E. J. Toof. There were, of ourse, other features in her character, but they were so knit together and were possessed in such omplete harmony as to make the character as a vhole truly majestic. There were intelligence, aith, hope, love, courge, strength, sweetness, entleness, patience, devotion, unselfishness, self-ontrol, etc., blended in such proportions as to onstitute a character which in its wholeness was simply majestic.

Mary Bryson was born in Kentucky in 1825. When she was yet young her parents moved to lowa. Her people were of the Methodist faith. From them by the law of heredity and as a matter of education she was religious. She could not remember when she did not believe in and love God and his Son, Jesus our Lord. It was in 1842 or '43, when she was seventeen or eighteen years ld, that she become acquainted with Aaron Chaterton, preacher of the primitive faith. This was the beginning of her acquaintance with the Disiples of Christ. She heard Mr. Chatterton preach n the home of Mr. S. C. Toof, her future fathern-law, in Lee County, Iowa. The lad who was sent through the sparsely settled neighborhood of those days on horseback to call the people together to hear the Word of life spoken by the stranger was Edwin J. Toof, her future husband. The conception and presentation of the gospel commended itself to the mind of this bright Kentucky girl as eminently reasonable. No long time passed before she surrendered heart and conscience and life to Jesus as Lord. This was the beginning of a career pathetic, sweet, humble, courageous, useful, triumphant.

She married and became the mother of two children. Her noble husband died. There was a girl-baby and a little boy to be cared for and trained for God and the heavenly home. Her financial resources were small. There are those who now speak of her cheerfulness in that dark hour. Her faith faltered not; her courage failed not. Her conviction was intelligent. She knew Him in whom she believed. Not on seen things, but on unseen, she fixed her attention. She endured as seeing the invisible.

Aaron Chatterton, through whose ministry Mrs. Toof was led to Christ, now became associated at Fort Madison, Iowa, with Daniel Bates, who had recently begun the publication of a religious periodical at Mount Pleasart, Iowa, now known as the Christian-Evangelist. This young woman was a sort of mother in those early days to this magnificent enterprise, destined to become such a blessing to uncounted multitudes. The late J. T. Toof, then her little but intelligent "Tommy," folded the papers and directed them. For many years the Christian-Evangleist publication office was in a building owned by Dr.

E. J. Toof in Fort Madison. My knowledge of the Toof family began with their residence in Fort Madison. Daniel Bates was a great man. No ordinary man could have started a paper of such a character and succeeded in carrying it on under the circumstances of that time. But the good man had a worthy helper in the person of Mrs. Toof—and other such women there were, and men too, in those days in which the courage of Disciples of the Christ was sorely tried.

In 1852 this enthusiastic young Christian became the wife of Dr. Edwin J. Toof. More than forty-eight years they walked the way of life together. Their mutual devotion was beautiful. In them was seen a happy married life. They loved God and each other. The Giver of all good bestowed his favors upon them.

The early preachers of New Testament Christianity in Iowa, Illinois and Missouri were their friends. A complete list of their names cannot now be made out-nor is it necessary. It would however, contain such well-known names as Ross, Creath, Kane, Miller, Henderson, Bates, McConnell-household words among the Disciples of Christ throughout the land. Alexander Campbell and his wife were entertained by Mother Toof when they made together their last tour through the West. She was Martha and Mary in one. Material good things were provided for the saints in her home; but she at the same time found opportunities to gain knowledge and inspiration for high and holy endeavor from their conversation. Angels were they to her. How she fairly reveled in the companionship of these messengers of

The Toofs neither forgot the past, as time moved on, nor were they spoiled by the prosperity which came to them. The hospitality of the former days was continued after the removal of the family to the East-in fact, it was increased with increasing ability. The doors of the New Haven home stood wide open for a quarter of a century to receive the Disciplos of Christ and the many friends who passed that way. Not only her church brethren, but distinguished men enjoyed her bounteous hospitality. The late Justice Samuel F. Miller, of the United States Supreme Court, the late ex Senator Jas. R. Doolittle, of Wisconsin, with ex-Governor Drake, of Iowa, and their families were old and devoted friends and frequent visitors at the New Haven home.

Mother Toof was a student of the Word. The scenes of the Bible incidents were dear to her. She dreamed of a time when she would be able to visit the lands of the Bible. In 1886-'7 when she was in the sixty second year of her age, she was able to gratify her desire. Her children and granddaughter accompanied her and enjoyed with her the advantages of the trip. In the company of Isaac Errett, W. T. Moore, Z. T. Sweeney and others she ascended Mount Vesuvius, visited the Pyramids of Egypt and made the journey on horseback through Palestine and Syria. She rested at noonday by the Jordan, was present and participated in the Lord's table services held on a Sunday afternoon in an "upper room" at Jerusalem and spent a night on the shore of the Sea of Galilee. In spite of all that superstition and ignorance have done to shock the intelligent Christian in this interesting country her vigorous faith and extensive knowledge of God's Word enabled her to enter into blessed associations with her Lord; and as she rode over the hills and valleys they were made to repeat again his deeds of love and words of truth.

In this beloved woman intelligence, kindness, courage, loyalty and patience were united and made to increase more and more by an abiding faith in the Christ.

Her daughter, Mrs. John Campbell Avery, says of this noble mother:

"I never saw her angry. I never heard her speak a hasty or unkind word to any human being. I have seen her sorely tried, but I never saw her yleld. My earliest recollection of a Bible lesson from her lips was the passage from Prov. 16:32: 'He that is slow to anger is better than the mighty, and he that ruleth his spirit than he who taketh a city,' and to simplify it to my childish understanding she explained that it meant: 'He that controlleth his tongue is greater than he who taketh a city.'"

Mother Toof did not live for herself; she lived for others, she possessed in large measure the mind of the Master. Those who knew her best loved her most, and marveled at her wondrous unselfishness in labors for others. One who knew her intimately says: "She carried help and comfort about with her as a flower carries its perfume."

Characters like this never die; Mother Toof is not dead; she has gone on before. B. B. T.

The Kentucky State Meeting.

August 20th to 23rd was the time and Carlisle, Nicholas county, the place. This was the home of the famous Rogers family, to which our cause in Kentucky owes so great a debt. John Rogers organized the Carlisle Church and preached for it some forty years. To him more than to any other man it owes the fact that it is one of our very best Kentucky churches. F. M. Tinder, its present pastor, is greatly beloved in the community, and is pushing the work to greater success than ever. As the leading spirit in providing entertainment for one of our big conventions he is entitled to the highest praise. A delightful rain cooled the atmosphere, and so the convention sat in great comfort.

The Christian Woman's Board of Missions, Mrs. A. M. Harrison presiding, opened its sessions Monday night and closed them Tuesday night. Our good women never fail to provide an interesting program. They were favored with the presence of Miss Mary Graybiel, one of our pioneer missionaries to India, whose talks went straight to the heart. Miss Mattie Pounds, national superintendent of the children's work, one of our best platform speakers, was also on hand and made a most stirring address. Mrs. Harrlson's thoughtsul words as president were marked by special timeliness. Nearly all our Kentucky women, oftentimes, to their own great surprise, are natural orators. When you have heard Mrs. Yancey, Miss Susie Sublette, Mrs. Shawhan, Mrs. Wells and dozens of others like them, in earnest appeals for their great work, you are filled with wonder at the power and fitness of their words. Our Kentucky C. W. B. M. made an unequaled record in the past year. It raised $12,000 for missions. Of this sum, however, Mrs. Mollie Fant Pearce, of Covington, gave $5,000. The other $7,000 was raised by the auxiliaries and Children's Bands. It is a noble record and exceeds all others. Our Morehead Academy, which hitherto has been carried on by our Men's Society, has been passed over to the C. W. B. M., and now both Hazel Green Academy and Moorehead will have the fostering care of our good women. They are both prosperous and growing more so continually.

One of our beloved Kentucky girls, Mrs. W. M. Forrest, the daughter of H. D. Clark, of Mount Sterling, goes to India as a missionary with her husband in a few weeks Truly, our mission fields are claiming the best we have. Mrs. Forrest's presence and good words at the convention had a peculiar and touching interest in coasequence.

Wednesday morning Pres. W. S. Willis called the sixtieth convention of our Kentucky brotherhood to order. The sad and sudden death of Charles Allen Thomas, of Louisville, the day previous, who was on the program to discuss "Sunday-schools and Destitute Fields," threw its shadow | over all hearts. Something like 400 delegates were in attendance which in view of an unprecedented heated term that has made existence almost a burden for weeks past, is something] of an astonishment. It was a wise move to change the time of our Kentucky state convention hereafter to the first week in October. Paris gets the convention next year.

The report of the board showed enlarged receipts for the year and indicated a growing work. All our state societies have of recent years been falling behind, somewhat, but there is every reason to believe that Kentucky at least is coming up again to the high-water mark of eight or ten years ago. The receipts coming directly into the treasury were $6,204.89, while those indirectly resulting from our evangelists' work were more [than twice this sum. The total sum raised was $20,436.29. Counting all the receipts from Kentucky churches and Sunday-schools to our various missionary enterprises at home and abroad, they gave in all the past y ar $51,752.77. Thirty persons were kept at work during the year and over 1,500 additions gained. Besides the constant evangelistic work done our society maintains, in whole or in part, permanent preachers at Bardstown, Ashland, Kenton, California, Campbellsville, Milldale, Bellevue, Lebanon, Choateville and Berea. And hereafter its policy will be to do more and more of this kind of work, experience having shown its eminent wisdom. H. W. Elliott, our efficient state evangelist, continues his labors. The president for the ensuing year is Geo. A. Miller, of Covington. The board is made up as heretofore, save that Prof. S. M Jefferson, the new addition to the teaching force of Kentucky University and the Bible College, takes the place of W. B. Taylor. Good speeches were made by President Willis, James Vernon, E. S. Stearns (our missionary to Japan), H. C. Garrison, H. D. Clark, J. T. Hawkins, T. S. Tinsley, Wm. F. Rogers, R. B. Neal, Prof. J. J. Rucker, G. G. Bersot, G. W. Muckley (of the United States of America!), C. W. Dick, Pres. J. W. McGarvey and others. I should like to specify points of excellence, which were many, but space forbids.

From out of the state we had visitors from Missouri in J. B. Briney and his son Russell, and A. W. Kokendoffer, who strongly urged the claims of the approaching National Conventions at Kansas City. A. B. Griffith was present from Ohio and Miss Virginia Hearn, who spoke on "The School of Pastoral Helpers." J. W. Ligon, of Sebrel, represented the Southwest Kentucky convention and gave us a cheery talk. F. M. Tinder was appointed to bear greatings to the Southwest Kentucky convention next May.

November 4th was chosen as the specific date for making our offering to state missions, and every effort will be made to bring all the churches into line. It is one of our greatest needs to have a uniform date for this offering.

We had a sad mortality list the past year in the loss of Mrs. Sarah Keene, Alex. C. Hopkins, Robert T. Mathews, Chas. Allen Thomas, J. N. Boyd, Henry Ranshaw, Mrs. Hubbell Chinn, Mrs. J. P. Fant and many others. The workmen fall but the work goes on.

Dr. Talks of Food.

PRES. OF BOARD OF HEALTH.

"What shall I eat?" is the daily inquiry the physician is met with. I do not hesitate to say that in my judgment, a large percentage of disease is caused by poorly selected and improperly prepared food. My personal experience with the fully cooked food, known as Grape-Nuts, enables me to speak freely of its merits.

"From overwork, I suffered several years with malnutrition, palpitation of the heart, and loss of sleep. Last summer I was led to experiment personally with the new food, which I used in conjunction with good rich cow's milk. In a short time after I commenced its use, the disagreeable symptoms disappeared, my heart's action became steady and normal, the functions of the stomach were properly carried out and I again slept as soundly and as well as in my youth.

"I look upon Grape-Nuts as a perfect food, and and no one can gainsay but that it has a most prominent place in a rational, scientific system of feeding. Any one who uses this food will soon be convinced of the soundness of the principle upon which it is manufactured and may thereby know the facts as to its true worth." W. B. Conway, M. D., Pres. Athens (Ga.) Board of Health.

Grand Army of Christ-Creston Department.

If the many churches where we have labored have been wondering why they have seen no re ports from us for two years, our answer is that for some time after coming here we were so busy that we had no time for reporting; and when we did finally have time the habit of not reporting had been formed, like the habit of staying away from church, and therefore .-

But if our long silence has been interpreted to mean that our labors have been barren of results. the subjoined report will be a sufficient correction; and if it is beyond the average length of reports, our brother editors will be lenient, no doubt, since we have not infringed on their patience for so long.

When we (the plaral pronoun includes Mrs. S. throughout this report) began our work here in October, '98, according to the unanimous testimony of the church board, the church was straggling between life and death with an actual membership of about 150 and the board unwilling to pledge more than 50 workers. The entire church was sadly discouraged, and the general gloom was deepened because of a $1,500 mortgage against the building and a total indebtedness of $2,200, most of which had been standing on interest for about seven years. With this kind of an outlook we accepted the call, hoping with God's help to restore the church to a normal condition of strength and growth and to remove the indebtedness in four or five years of hard work.

Within 18 months, with the help of God and the earnest co-operation of faithful workers, the membership had increased by 150 additions, at least 100 being by baptism. Many also who had grown cold or lukewarm were renewed in faithfulness, and every department of the church pulsated with new life.

And finally, after thorough planning and many months of earnest wo k and prayer, the entire indebtedness was raised, and at a great rally day service the cruel mortgage was burned in the presence of a rejoicing people. In the raising of this debt, however, we must first give praise to Him who is the chief source of all true success; and we are glad to acknowledge very valuable assistance from Bro. Simpson Ely, who held a short meeting for us and fully co-operated with us in all our plans; and finally we most gratefully give credit for our great victory to the enthusiastic sacrifices of the faithful brethren and sisters.

It should also be said that of the 150 additions about 60 were from a union meeting in which we heartily co-operated with other churches, and about 18 were from our meeting conducted by Bro. Ely.

But we have decided to close our work in this field the first Lord's day in October, and if the question arises among our friends as to why we leave the field just when so much has been accomplished, the answer is that the sacrifice we have had to make during the two years is greater than we can longer continue; and the other and chief reason is that we are fully equipped for larger fields and larger opportunities. We are, therefore, ready to correspond with churches with a member ship of from 500 to 1,000. Correspondents may address me directly at Creston, Ia, or they can write to B. S. Denny, state secretary 200 4th St., Des Moines, Ia.

I will just drop one hint to all applicants for this field, viz., that any who do not know enough about business to enclose stamps for replies will receive no reply, much less a call.

Grand Rally and Roll Call.

To the brethren scattered abroad:

GREETING. Sunday Sept. 16, 1900, has been lesignated by the Church of Christ at Greeley. a., us the day for a general rally and roll call. Every member of this congregation is hereby espectifully requested to report to this meeting ither in person or by letter.

Members living within reasonable reach of Greeley will be expected to be present, and those iving at a distance are earnestly requested to write and tell us of their faith in Christ, and whether you wish still to be continued as members of this congregation.

All former pastors who may see this notice are requested to be present; but if you cannot come please write a word of encouragement to be read before the assembly. Whether you live at a disance or within reasonable reach, if you are a member of this congregation, do not fail to write f you cannot be present. We want to get in line for a big meeting this fall or early winter. Will you kindly drop me a card at once telling us whether you can or cannot be present.

Fraternally yours, D. H BAYS, pastor.

Missouri Sunday-school Association.

The thirty-fifth annual convention of this wellknown organization was held at Columbia, Mo., beginning Aug. 28. The meeting was not as large as some in former years, but all parts of the state were represented and the delegates in intelligence and zeal for the cause seemed to rank very high. The Disciples of Christ had by far the largest delegation and among them were the following ministers: M. J. Nicoson, C. H. Ninden, W. S. St. Clair, J. G. Creason, E. M. Smith, J. W. Monser, Harold Monser, W. T. Moore, B. F. Goslin, G. A. Hoffmann, L. H. Cupp and Simpson Ely. On the program we were represented by Mrs. Jennie Conway, St. Louis, and Simpson Ely, Brookfield. This is well as far as it goes, but it seems where fifty different subjects are discussed in a union meeting in Missouri our people should assume a larger share of the work and responsibility. The program rendered was exceedingly practical and helpful and all Sunday-school workers present felt greatly benefited. The sessions were held in the University Chapel and the delegates were generously cared for by the churches. W. H. McClain, St. Louis, was elected one of the vice-presidents and G. A. Hoffmann denominational secretary for the next year for the Christian Churches. The reports of the convention indicated that good work was being done and nearly $2,000 was raised to begin work with for the coming year. Take it all in all, this was a good and very instructive meeting. G. A. HOFFMANN.

State Mission Notes.

It was the privilege of the secretary to attend the Kansas State Convention at Ottawa last week. The attendance was not up to the usual standard. The nearness in time and space of the National Convention at Kansas City was a hindrance in this respect, many not feeling able to attend both and that the National Convention was the chance of a lifetime, nearly. So they staid at home and missed the State Convention. In so doing they missed a feast of good things. Kansas has some splendid men, and they had some of their best on the program, and that which they gave was of the highest order. Then they had such as B. L. Smith, G. L. Wharton, G. A. Hoffmann, R. H. Waggoner, F. E. Meigs and the writer. The report of the Supt. of Missions, W. S. Lowe, was a splendid exhibit of work done under the most difficult circumstances. The determination to do greater work next year was characteristic of Kansas push and grit. The veteran, Walter Chenault, of Fort Scott, was the model presiding officer. It was an enjoyable occasion. But deliver me from a picnic ground for a state convention.

This reminds us that our own State Convention is coming on apace and will soon be here. Have you sent in your name to Bro. S. B. Moore at Moberly? If not, send it now. Read the railroad announcements in another column. We have no doubt but what we will have the one-fare rate on all the railroads in the state, at least on all the trunk lines. But I want to say, If we do not have the attendance which such rates dem and, we shall get turned down with a wonderful vigor. There ought to be the largest attendance we have had in years. Let the preachers bring the matter to the attention of the congregations all over the state and urge attendance.

I have written to so many preachers conserning their churches and state missions and it would astonish you to see how many have not given even the courtesy of a reply. Strange that a minister of God's Word should be so lacking in this grace. But many have, and have said that they would see that their churches came to the front. Brother, the time is short, you must act at once. We are depending on you. Don't let it fail. Yours in T. A. ABBOTT. His name.

The California State Meeting.

Although the California state meeting of 1900 is a thing of the past, yet it has left such a living force in its wake that its work will go on through the ages. The attendance was large from first to last and the preaching force of the state probably has never had a better representation, both in ability and numbers. Another very encouraging feature of the meeting was the number of consecrated young preachers, who, with strength and vigor are standing in the front of the army, "showing themselves approved unto God."

The personnel of the convention will compare favorably with a like gathering of any other state or occasion.

Several of the preachers were new in the state. They do not know yet how the "state will strike them" nor how "they will strike the state." This kind of a strike is both ways, but it is often the preacher comes to California and things do not go his way. He may forget that "sizing up" as they call it comes from both sides.

We have a grand set of men on the watchtowers, all of the same blood and bone as our friends of the states, but climate, fruit and flowers of California tell on the human fibre with a vitalizing power that cannot be questioned.

The Ministerial Association spent two days in a series of critical papers, fully up to the standard. From one to three days were set apart for each of the Christian Endeavors, S. S., C. W. B. M. and state convention, besides one day was set apart as temperance day and it proved to be one of the most interesting days af the convention.

The two weeks spent at Santa Cruz this year were filled with busy days. There were from three to seven services each day, but enough time was taken for every one to plunge into the surf or try their strength against the tide. The old ocean behaved most lovely, giving us its purest breath, rejuvenating every soul with its fresh ozone, so that the elder thought himself young again. As an example of this, our Bro. Jopson, the Los Gatos preacher of several years' standing, seized one of the brethren in a sporting way, which resulted in the brother breaking his leg!

The singing was very fine—decidedly the best we have had since '97, when our music was led by Bro. J. H. Fillmore. This time Bro. E. T. Nesbit was our musical director, and he did it well, with a large class of singers under his direction. The music would have done credit to a national convention, and when the national convention comes to California will make ye visitors think the year of jubilee "am come" in more ways than one.

All great conventions are turning their faces toward the "Golden Gate." We are expecting it and beginning to get ready for you.

Prof. Van Kirk, our new dean of the Bible Seminary, received a warm welcome. We tried to make him and his wife feel that this is next to the "promised land" and that the way to the hearts of the people is as easy as the way to their houses. The professor's lectures on the "Life and Times of A. Campbell" were largely attended and deeply interesting.

The beautiful tract of land adjoining the park, that was bought last year, was soon sold off in lots to brethren from different parts of the state. One was presented to the state C. E., and one to the C. W. B. M. A number of neat cottages will be erected during the year. Bro. Freeman has most wisely managed the park plans.

Santa Cruz is proving to be a Jerusalem whither the tribes will annually visit with their families, to dwell for a time by the sea, to sweeten their spirits, drink of the gospel fountain and gather strength and enthusiasm for a grand year's work for the Lord against the mighty.

The Spirit of the Lord was with us in our convention, and we were made to feel that we were in Kansas State Conxention.

The Kansas churches met again in their annual convention at Ottawa, Aug. 20-24. In some respects it was the greatest convention the state ever held.

Every period was an intellectual and spiritual feast and each one if possible more enthusiastic than the one preceding it. The C. W. B. M. reported over $1,100 paid to our National Board the last year.

The field superintendent reported $2,700 received and disbursed for Kansas missions.

Officers for the new year: President, W. Chenault; superintendent of Bible school department, F. E. Mallory; superintendent of C. E., D. S. Kelley; C. W. B. M., president, Mrs. L. F. Ingels; secretary and office superintendent, Miss A. R. Pendleton; superintendent of Junior work, Mrs. D. Stewart; superintendent of missions, W. L. Lowe; superintendent of B. N. E., William Alpin.

As China is the burning question of the hour Bro. F. E. Meigs was a favorite everywhere, and his address was received with a passion of appro-

Two of the truly great addresses were made by Bro. G. L. Wharton. Every sentence was a diamond that sparkled, and did not our hearts burn within us as he told us of India's need of Christ?

Brethren Wagoner, Smith, Hoffmann, Abbott and Lockhart, each in turn, made masterly addresses, sparkling with wit and wisdom.

The convention listened with rapt attention to Prof. G. P. Coler's Bible lessons. The comments of the Kansas preachers were grand, beautiful, so scholarly and yet so modest.

We so much appreciate the help and co-operation of these visiting brethren. We were delighted to meet them and hope they will come again. The Sunflower State will ever give them a warm welcome.

"The Romig Meeting."

We thank a number of friends for donations to the "Romig meeting fund," in reply to Bro. H. O. Breeden's letter in the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST of a few weeks ago. In answer to a number of inquiries, I will say: We greatly need this meeting. A meeting has never been held here. "Our plea" is little understood. The whole brotherhood will be benefited by the building up of the "cause" here. There are hundreds of our own people who come here and are destitute, and must be assisted. The K. of P.s. who number far less than our own people, are bending every effort to build a $250,-000 sanitarium to care for their people. If this is the need of a "lodge," what must be the need of the "church" which has as large a percentage represented. We must build up the "chnrch' here. We must build a "Christian Home." You can now assist by contributing to this "meeting fund." Bros. E. C. Browning, H. O. Breeden, Geo. F. Hall and L. C. Wilson, with others, have assisted in this effort, knowing the need. The C. W. B. M., and it is just like these godly women, have contributed $50.00. "fund," in pledges and money, has $100.00 in it, and we now only need $100.00 more. Brethren, you ought to send this in at once. We have not announced the date of the meeting. We not until we have raised the funds needed. We can again thank all who have assisted, and hope since we have one half the amount that we can soon close this appeal for funds with an announcement T. N. KINCAID. of the date.

DEAR EDITOR:—This trite but true saying applies to the practice of medicine as well as to the art of cooking. The doctor must prove his skill by curing the disease. That is what I am doing for several hundred of your readers at this time. Over four thousand people subject to the Catarrh of the Head, Nose, Ear, Throat or Lungs, have been cured by me in the past year.

Please publish this fact, and tell those of your readers who are afflicted with Asthma, Bronchitis, Catarrh, Coughs, Weak Lungs or Consumption, that if they will write me a short history of their case, I will mail them a special treatment of the famous Saca-Cera, free of all charges.

Pulmonary diseases should be attended to at once, before severe weather sets in. Those who are subject to cough and weak lungs, should begin treatment as early as possible. Address Dr. Marshall Beaty, 202 W. 9th Street, Cincinnati, O. Don't forget to mention the CHRISTIAN-EVAN-GELIST when you write.

Book Notes.

You have probably been reading with pleasure, this summer, the letters of travel by W. E. Garrison. You should secure and read, if you have not already done so, Mr. Garrison's book, "Wheeling Through Europe." This delightful volume contains the story of two summers spent on a bicycle in England, Scotland, Wales, France, Germany, Holland, Belgium, Switzerland, Austria and Italy. It is a most entertaining book, beautifully printed and bound, and handsomely illustrated with halftone plates made from photographs taken by the author. Price, $1.00.

Our "Special Caialogue No. 22" was a great success. Through it we sold thousands of volumes and made a great many friends. The phenomenally low prices quoted in this little pamphlet were intended to prevail only during the summer months, but we have not yet withdrawn the catalogue, or canceled the prices contained in it. During the month of September we will continue to fill orders at these low prices, provided stock is not exhausted.

Now that the hot summer is ended, our Sundayschools and churches will arouse themselves to greater activity. New campaigns will be planned, reorganizations will take place, new equipment will be secured. Speaking of new equipmenthow about song books? Does your church or school need new books? If so, drop us a card and let us send you neat little pamphlets giving sample pages (reduced) fac-simile of cover, pricelist, etc., of our two largest books-"Silver and Gold" and "Tidings of Salvation." These are both splendid works. "Tidings of Salvation" (music edition) can be secured as cheaply as $10.00 per hundred copies. At this rate no school or church need be inadequately supplied with music

No preacher among us should be without the complete works of Alexander Campbell. As a theologian, reformer, thinker, he must always stand as the pre-eminent figure of his century. His greatness is being more and more appreciated as the years go by. The books which he left have a permanent value, especially to our own preachers. They are now sold by the Christian Publishing Company at very low prices, when purchased singly and separately, and even cheaper when the entire set is taken at once. We supply Campbell's Complete Work--eight volumes and three pamphlets-for only Eight Dollars.

"Alexander Campbell's Theology," by Dr. W. E. Garrison, is attracting much attention and is receiving much high praise. It is a most important addition to the distinctive literature of the Disciples of Christ. It is a scholarly, thoughtful work, giving evidence of careful research and much study. It should be read and re read by every person who has an intelligent interest in the history of our reformation. It is handsomely printed and bound, and is sent, postpaid, for $1.00.

The River of Life.

GRACE PEARL BRONAUGH.

Where the River of our dreams Floweth on to unknown seas, Where the light of heaven streams 'Mid the shadows of the trees,— We may search the valley o'er If perchance the clear light shows What our lives have missed before,— Where the Silent River flows.

We may claim our meed of bliss, Merit d at heaven's cost.

We may find the things we miss,
And the things that we have lost. We may find amid the throng Some one whom our spirit knows,-Find the face for which we long, Where the Silent River flows.

It may be that there is scope For the castles we would build; It may be that every hope In that Land shall be fulfilled. And the work we leave behind, And the strength that comes and goes,-We may seek and we may find, Where the Silent River flows.

We may hear it if we will, Though the world may hear it not. 'Tis a stream so deep and still, Few can find the verdant spot. But we love to hear its voice, And the mystic spell it throws Makes our weary hearts rejoice, Where the Silent River flows.

We may hear it through the day, If our hearts are open wide; We may hear it on its way, Flowing softly by our side Never fear of things to come Shall disturb the soul's repose; And the past—it shall be dumb Where the Silent River flows.

It is never heard by men Who are hungering after gold. It is seldom heard again Where the clamoring crowds enfold. And its voice is rarely known 'Mid the shriek of battle blows. You must go and stand alone Where the Silent River flows

There shall be no cold nor heat, Winds that blow nor waves that break; Suns that burn nor snows that beat; Eyes that weep nor hearts that ache. For that valley hath no dead; Neither hath it any woes. There is nothing more to dread Where the Silent River flows.

'Tis the Land whence all trails tend; Winding slowly o'er the wold. 'Tis the Land where all dreams end, Be the dreamer young or old. For the dream is to the fact What the leaf is to the rose. Life will hold the thing it lacked Where the Silent River flows.

Not the River that we know. But the River of our God, Where the asphodel doth blow Where the drowsy lilies nod. When the feet turn from the town And the weary eyelids close, Then in dreams we wander down Where the Silent River flows.

It is flowing clear and bright, You may hear it if you hark.
Through the day and through the night,
Through the light and through the dark. And the mighty current swells, Ever deepens, ever grows, Lik- the peace of him who dwells Where the Silent River flows. Fair Haven, Vermont.

"Not Handsome to Say the Least."

M. LA FAY GESTRUE.

Perhaps the majority of boys and girls who read the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST would like to know what Frances Willard called her "painful experience." It was that she was "not handsome to say the least."

The impolite manners of others on the subject only increased her mortification. The fact that her sister was handsome only made poor Frances' homely features more conspicuous.

Schoolmates when angry called her "Redhead," which made her heart ache. Her mother comforted her by telling how much she was like Grandpa Hill, a good and saintly man whose hair was also red when he was a child, but which, when he was grown, was a beautiful golden brown.

Other folks were not so comforting. Once a girl near her own age said: "Aren't you sorry to be so homely, Frank?" And another: "You are the drawn image of Mrs B-" the woman whom everybody thought was the homeliest person in the community.

How well it would be if people would learn what good conversation is, and practice it, eliminating personal topics that infringe upon the feelings-unkind, personal comments, which only indicate at best rude manners. Let us consider this beautiful admonition of Harriet Beecher Stowe:

"Let us all resolve, first, to attain the grace of silence; second, to deem all faultfinding that does no good a sin and to resolve, when we are ourselves happy, not to poison the atmosphere of our neighbors by calling upon them to remark every painful and disagreeable feature in their daily life; third, to practice the grace and virtue of praise."

Frances Willard was always conscious of her personal appearance not being attractive. When she grew up her hair was a beautiful brown, soft and wavy, her physique quite good. That is about all that the critics of our face beauty could say. The last time she ever grieved over her unhandsomeness was when she was a college student. One of her teachers found her in tears, and after some persuasion she told the cause of her distress. This lady was too considerate to expostulate upon the subject, but quietly excused herself from the room for "just a moment." When she returned she brought with her a bulb of a well-known flower and a jar in which to plant it. She introduced for a topic of conversation, The People We Admire and Care for. They discovered that the people they most admired and cared most for were those who did the most for humanity; those most unselfish; the strong characters. And they were not what everybody called handsome. Frances pronounced them all "good looking," "handsome," "attractive," as each name was mentioned. But when they came to critically examine the features, great was her surprise. "Why is this?-no one speaks of their homeliness or handsomeness."

"Because their character and life is so beautiful that you do not think of their features. A critical examination would reveal very few hardsome people. Who speaks of Abraham Lincoln as a handsome man or as a homely man? Do you remember the beautiful girl we met the other evening in the park, and how we changed our opinion when we met her again at the lunch counter and heard her talk? On our way home we conversed on real beauty and concluded it was not all in complexion, features and form." This from her favorite teacher, who then presented the bulb and asked Frances to plant it in the jar. "Study the nature of the bulb, the soil and care it needs, and when it blooms you and I will think of this subject again."

Frances did as she was requested. She understood. She thought the bulb an ugly thing at first glance, but the more she looked at it and thought of the life it contained and its possibilities the less she thought of its ugliness, and when it began to grow and sent forth a beautiful flower the bulb was not thought of as ugly at all. Here was her lesson.

Who speaks of Frances Willard as homely or handsome? She buried her life in service and sent forth blossom and fragrance into the hearts and homes of thousands on both continents. She did not drift with the current. No character can without sinking beneath the waves and failing in life's purpose. Service is life. When we look u.on the faces of Abraham Lincoln and Frances Willard we do not look in vain. The furrowed lines show the "saved to serve" spirit. Beautiful, beautiful character, servant of all, is stamped upon every line of their countenances.

How much are we all like the bulbs, producing flowers of various hues and fragrance; the blasted and unfragrant; some lives like a summer's nosegay, withered and tossed aside-lived for self. Others overcome by the storms-individuality crushed, broken wills, drifting with the current, aimless lives, undeveloped, like the thousands you meet in the streets. There are Frances Willards, Lincolns, Harriet Beecher Stows everywhere, living for others, beautiful characters, and you do not say handsome or homely. What has become of those rude persons who afflicted the feelings of Frances Wil'ard, and said: "Don't your face ache?it is so homely!" Let us hope they have become kind men and women and learned life's secret. Bury your life in service and you will be so busy bringing forth friut that you will have no time to afflict any one. This will qualify you in overcoming and enduring afflictions-even that of being home-

Some Mohammedan Ceremonies.

A. L. CHAPMAN.

As the Apostle Paul said of the Athenians n the first century, so also may we say of he people of this country at the close of he nineteenth century: they are very reigious. Unlike the Athenians, however, hey are monotheistic in their faith, and not an idol is worshiped in all the land. Mohamnedan, Jew and Christian alke look to the God of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob as the only true and living God. "All have a zeal or God, but not according to knowledge." Although Mohammedanism has destroyed he idols and images of the land, it does not follow that idolatry has been abolished and hat the people worship the Father in spirit and in truth. For when the form of idolatry as been suppressed without changing the dolatrous heart, the idolatry still remains and will manifest itself in other and different forms. And where there is not the enlightenment of truth and the quickening of the Spirit within there is bound to be a uperabundance of forms and ceremonies in he worship of the people. This is especialy noticeable among both Mohammedans and Christians in this country. There is no etter aid to the understanding of the reigious condition of a people than a knowedge of these forms and ceremonies, hence shall here describe briefly some of the Mohammedan ceremonies which have fallen inder my observation, and in another rticle will tell something of the ceremonies f the Greeks and Armenians.

PRAYERS

Prayer occupies a prominent place in the eligion of Mohammedans, and with them consists largely in repeating many times a et form of prayers. Five times a day the nuezin calls the people to prayers by crying rom the minarets of the mosques: "God is good, God is great, there is no God but God, and I testify that Mohammed is his prophet!" Then the faithful, regardless of where they re or who is watching, prostrate themelves and facing toward Mecca pray to God. Friday is their special day for worhip in the mosques. The priests read from he Koran, recite prayers and deliver adresses upon religious topics to the people resent.

PILGRIMAGES.

Every good Mohammedan is supposed to nake a pilgrimage to Mecca at least once in a lifetime. They attach great importance o such a pilgrimage. About four weeks before Ramazan the sacred caravan with presents for pilgrims and for the shrines at Mecca leaves Constantinople with great ceremony. This year, according to official statistics, 220,000 Moslems have made the pilgrimage to Mecca.

RAMAZAN.

This is the month of special of religious observance among the Mohammedans. They fast through the day and feast at night. On the fifteenth of Ramazan, the anniversary of the flight of Mohammed, the Sultan eaves the seclusion of Yildiz and visits a mosque in Stamboul, where is kept the sacred mantle of the prophet. Several different routes are prepared by the sprinkling of sand for His Majesty to pass, but this year he ignored them all, and in the interest of personal safety went by water to the nearest point to the mosque. A city paper described the visit in part as follows: "After performing his midday prayers His Majesty presumably opened the chest containing the sacred articles, priests singing hymns and reading the Koran in the meantime. His Majesty reverently kissed the mantle and invited those present to do the same. All the ministers and state officials of high rank successively performed this pious duty and passing before the Sultan received from His Majesty a valuable handkerchief, rendered sacred by contact with the prophet's relic. The Imperial Princes and after them the Valide Sultana (mother of the Sultan) and the ladies of the Imperial harem were admitted to kiss the relic. His majesty remained in the hall till the hour of afternoon prayer." On this day the Sultan always received a new wife and the greatest gathering of the year is held in St. Sophia. At the close of Ramazan three days are devoted to special fasting.

THE SACRIFICE FEAST.

Another feast of some importance among the Mohammedans is in commemoration of Abraham's sacrifice. Every family that can afford it must sacrifice a lamb on this occasion, the flesh to be given to the poor. This feast is a time for repentance of sins and the payment of all debts, but unfortunately, the Turks are much like other people and do not always live up to their religion.

DANCING DERVISHES.

Among the Mohammedan; there are as many different opinions about their religion and as many sects as are found among Christians. We recently visited a convent of Dancing Dervishes. The floor of their mosque is circular and as smooth as any dancing floor. The chief priest sat upon a rug opposite the entrance and on each side of him was a circular line of worshipers dressed in various colored robes, with very high tan-colored tile hats. They danced or whirled to a weird Oriental air in a very graceful manner, their movements intended to personify the planetary system revolving around the sun. When tired and perspiring and in a worshipful (?) state of mind they prostrate themselves upon the floor, while attendants covered them with additional robes to prevent their taking cold. One of their number then arose and recited a prayer, pronouncing blessings upon the Sultan and other dignitaries of their faith, both living and dead. At the close of this service they kissed their chief in turns and after kissing each other's hands passed out bowing towards Mecca. The course of training to become a member of this order of dervishes covers a period of 1,001 days. There is another similar order called the Howling Dervishes, which meets in another part of the city.

HASAN AND HOSEIN.

The Persian Mohammedans every year celebrate the martyrdom of Hasan and Hosein in a most heathenish manner. Hasan and Hosein were the sons of Ali who were the rightful successors to the Caliphate. They were put to death and Omar usurped the throne. The Shutes, or followers of Ali, look upon Hasan and Hosein as their greatest martyrs and after 1,200 years celebrate their death with the most gruesome demonstrations of grief. After sunset they form processions in the streets of Constantinople and march from Khan to Khan carrying flags and torches and crying: "Hasan, Hosein! Hasan, Hosein!" In the procession men cut themselves with swords and knives till they are covered with blood and sometimes fall from exhaustion. Others beat their naked backs with heavy chains till they are black and blue and bleeding. Every year a number of these die from injury or loss of blood, and others are laid up in the hospitals for weeks. For this blind devotion and service they expect great reward in paradise. To witness this bloody march and hear their doleful cries makes one shudder and realize something of what heathenism really means. This branch of Mohammedans accept the pure Koran, but reject the Talmud and other Jewish books and hold many opinions which the great body of Mohammedans regard as heretical.

THE SELAMLIC. This is by far the most interesting and spectacular of all Mohammedan ceremonies. Every Friday the Sultan goes in state to the mo que Hamedish near Yildiz for prayer. He is a zealous Mohammedan and performs his devotions with great regularity. In this ceremony there is combined with measures of safety the spectacular, which appeals with special force to the Oriental mind. The Sultan, no doubt, prays in secret. but on these occasions he sounds a trumpet before him and is accompanied by thousands of soldiers, both cavalry and infantry. From the Ambassador's Pavilion we got a good view of His Majesty as he passed not more than twenty feet from us. carriages of the Imperial harem, attended by eunuches, preceded him, but did not enter the mosque; they remained in the closed carriages till the ceremony was over. Four young princes with an attendant ran ahead of the Sultan's golden carriage, which was drawn by two beautiful white horses. Fresh sand was scattered upon the way over which he passed and elegant rugs were laid at the entrance of the mosque upon which he walked. His bodyguard vied with each other in their eagerness to do him service and ran after the carriage. As he was driven between the files of soldiers they saluted him and cried: "Long live our King!" He remained in the mosque about forty minutes. When he came out he stepped into the carriage alone and drove back to the palace. The Sultan is not a handsome man by any means. He wore a fez, a dark-gray overcoat and carried a sword. He has a sparse beard, a Roman nose and a sallow complex-He has a sad and worn countenance which speaks of much work and worry, if not a troubled conscience. Although he is called "the sick man on the Bosphorous," he is yet very much alive and the Ottoman Empire is not so tottering as many would like to believe.

The Parsonian Breakfast Idea.

In a recent issue of the CHRISTIAN-EVAN-GELIST I read with profound interest and satisfaction an able article of Bro. Parsons on the "Omission of Breakfast." I so fully agree with the position taken by the writer of the article in question that I feel "possessed with the spirit" of adding a few words in that line.

While the learned do not fully agree as to what constitutes the "Seven Wonders of the World," it is safe to say there will be great consensus of opinion among the people and "the rest of mankind" as to the importance of this non-breakfast idea. Its immortality is safe beyond peradventure. It being a true saying that "the man who causes a blade of grass to grow where none had grown before is a public benefactor," how almost infinitely greater a "benefactor" must be he who can successfully induce mankind to live and grow healthy and fat without eating-at least without eating breakfast!

Aside from the "health aspect" of the matter (which is the "paramount issue") there are other considerations which should not for a moment be lost sight of. The dowithout-breakfast idea will have a tendency to cheapen food the world over, and that is just what "bread-winners" are clamoring The less quantity of food consumed would cause the provision market to be overstocked and a general cheapening in the price of "pancakes and potatoes" would be sure to follow.

Again, the non-breakfast idea would afford the cook and the family a longer time to indulge in "balmy sleep" at the morning hour than they would have if hustled out of bed for breakfast when the gray streaks of dawn first make their appearance. It may by true that "the early bird gets the worm," but if the worm did not go out in search of an early breakfast the bird would not be able to appropriate it.

To sum the matter up, the omitting of breakfast would be a great saving in grocer's bills, morning dishwashing would become a "lost art," coal and gasoline bills would be diminished, the morning kitchen drudgery would be eliminated and the avoirdupois of humanity would be greatly increased!

In order to success this new reform idea should be well introduced before the public. When a ship is to be successfully launched there must be a sufficient depth and volume of water to float it after it leaves the stocks. As with the ship, so is it with reforms, if they would be successful. They must be well launched. No doubt British India would be a good field to "open out" in. Several millions of persons in a part of the Indian Empire not only (per necessity) omit breakfast, but other daily meals as well. The people over there would have no trouble in adopting this reform!

Some years ago a boarding housekeeper 'out West" somewhere anticipated this reform idea somewhat. He furnished his boarders with "dried apples" for breakfast, warm water for dinner, and when the time for supper came the apples had "swelled up" to such an extent that additional food was neither required nor desired! It is useless to add that the rates at the aforesaid boarding house were very cheap indeed.

Once on a time a Hibernian conceived the idea that he could teach his horse to live and work without food. His theory was that no horse needed to eat, and that it would be a great saving of hay, oats, corn and grass if the animal were only taught to do without them. But unfortunately for Pat's reform idea, the horse took a notion to die just about the time his owner thought he was ready to graduate in the new reform theory!

But enough. This new idea will prove a blessing' and as revolutions never go backward the time may come when not only breakfast may be omitted, but dinner and supper also. Then indeed will the earth's "golden age" be reached. J. H. B.

I.—Linda May Goes Visiting.

J. BRECKENRIDGE ELLIS.

"Aunt Dollie," said Linda May, as she entered the house by the side door and latched it behind her, "may I go over to see Madge Morris?"

Aunt Dollie looked over her spectacles to see if the door had been latched, and then she said: "Have you watered the chickens?" "Yes, ma'am;" said Linda May. "And I picked up the sticks out of the bluegrass."

"You can stay an hour," said Miss Dollie; "just one, Linda May. Don't forget." And Aunt Dollie, who was mighty close to sixty years of age, and who saw no purpose to be gained by Linda May's visiting anybody. went on with her sewing. Linda May's parents were dead, and Aunt Dollie had raised her from infancy; she was still raising her, but she never liked it, and she looked forward impatiently for the time to come when the girl could go on and raise herself. But as Linda May was nearly twelve this period seemed very far off. The heart of Linda May danced when permission to visit Madge Morris had been granted. She looked at the clock, then walked quietly out of the house, because running was not allowed. But when once upon the sidewalk she walked very fast indeed. If she had not been fond of reading she would have found her life with Aunt Dollie a lonely one. No one in the town was kin to her except the old maiden aunt. Besides her books the girl had one great comfort, and that comfort was Madge. It was not that Linda May did not care for other girls; she was willing to like anybody. But Miss Dollie Dudley was very particular, and that is why Linda May Dudley did not get to visit many people.

As Linda May hurried along she took a keen delight in all about her. She noticed that Mr. Walker's big dog was howling in the barn where he had been chained up: she saw that the last rain had washed a piece of board across the gutter where it acted as a dam, making a little lake. She noticed that more sourgrass had gone to seed since she passed that way a week ago, and there was more yellow blcoms among the green pods, and she thought it funny that sourgrass pods should look like little grasshoppers. The delivery boy was carrying two squawking hens (by their legs) into Mr. Mitchel's back door. The monthly roses in Mrs. Gregg's front yard were falling off. A little toad hopped under the edge of the sidewalk when he heard her coming, and as Dr. Larry came around the corner his hat blew off and he had to run after it! Then Linda May came in sight of Mrs. Morris' house, and there in the yard were Madge and her two sisters and Letitia. Four girls in a ring on the grass, because Mrs. Morris didn't care how much you sat on her grass. I would like to have seen you sit on Miss Dollie Dudley's grass!

"Hello!" cried Madge, before Linda May reached the fence.

"Jump over," called Pete, Madge's youngest sister.

"I prefer the gate," said Linda May, entering Of course, nobody shook hands, for they had been together at school that day; and besides, children don't shake hands unless they must. Linda May seated herself upon the grass and pulled some of it. Mrs. Morris didn't care.

"That fence is just as easy," said Pete.
"You watch me." She jumped up and sprang over the fence, then back again.
"See? Want to do it?"

"Oh, Pete, come and sit down!" called Jennie—and she was eighteen; quite a young lady, in fact. "You're the only tomboy here." Pete began to walk the fence without replying. Of course, her name wasn't Pete, but nobody called her Prudence except her teacher, and I'm not going to either.

"I saw the funniest little toad as I was coming here," said Linda May. "It ran right under the sidewalk."

"In front of Mrs. Wiggles' house?" inquired Madge.

"Yes," said Linda May. "Why, did you see it?"

"Was it a little tine sey toad?" called Pete, jumping from the fence, "only about this big? I saw that toad." She climbed the fence again.

"Yes, I see him every day when I go to school," said Madge.

"Did you ever see it?" Linda May inquired of Letitia. Letitia was Pete's intimate friend, and of the same age; ten, namely.

"No," said Letitia, with a look of disgust; "I never look for toads."

"Some day I'm going to slip it in your pocket," Pete declared. "Then you'll look for it when you feel something kicking up against you.

"I have no pockets," said Letitia, with dignity.

"Girls," Madge announced, "I'm going to tell Linda May."

"Are you?" cried Letitia.

"Yes; she won't tell. It's a secret." Pete leaped from the fence and wiggled up to the group like a snake. They put their heads close together. "Linda May, we've got a mystery in the family," whispered Madge.

"You always have everything," said Linda May; "grass to roll on, and swings, and flowers you can pull, and—and everything."

"Well," said Pete, "you've got 'Aunt Dollie."

"What is the mystery?" Linda May inquired, without commenting on her own possession.

"The mystery is a man," whispered Madge. "Sh-h! You never know when he is around. And he's a tramp. He came here yesterday for his dinner. And he saw that little box of Jennie's laying out in the grass, and he says to mamma as he was going away: 'You look in that box tomorrow and see what you'll see!'"

"That's what he said," Pete whispered. "You look in that box to-morrow—"

"Oh, Pete don't roll you're eyes that way!" Letitia remonstrated. "It makes me real nervous."

"He rolled his eyes," said Pete. "You look in that box to-morow and see what you'll see!"

"I wouldn't try to look like that common person," said Letitia, primly. I might get like him."

"I ain't afraid," said Pete. "God made me, and when he did he made me a lady."

"Well, what was in the box?" demanded Linda May.

"Mamma had us bring the box in the house," said Madge. "And she said for us to have nothing to do with the tramp. Mamma was afraid of him."

"No wonder," said Linda May, "if he looked like Pete."

"But Pete slipped the box out after supper," said Jennie, "and this morning—"

"Let me tell it!" cried Madge. "And this morning she came running in with it, and there in the box was—"

"A letter and a sack of candy," shouted Pete. "There, I told it myself!"

"I never do get to tell anything," Madge complained. "And mamma read the letter and burned the letter, and wouldn't tell us what was in it, and told us not to ask her a single question!"

"But what became of the candy?" asked Linda May, for she considered this of more importance.

"It's gone," said Letitia, expressively.

"What kind was it?" asked Linda May, with enthusiasm.

"Gumdrops and chocolatedrops and buckeyes and niggerheels," said Pete, "and banana candy—um umh! And we saw mamma crying off alone, and I heard her say if papa had lived he would never have dared to bring that letter. And it's a mystery," concluded Pete. "But I'm going to be detective, and I'm laying for that tramp. My name is Penetrating Pete, and I'm on the trail."

THE RICH FOOL.*

The very title of our lesson shows how unlike the world's ideals were those of Jesus. In this age of fortune seeking, too many count the words "wealth" and "wisdom" as synonyms, and dub the man who is not "smart" enough to get rich a "poor fellow." Yet God, who bestows no title amiss, calls this rich man a fool, and no man who reads the parable thoughtfully will venture to question the divine judgment. The parable was called forth by an exhibition of human nature with which the world has ever been familiar. One of the multitude who heard Jesus speak and recognized his wisdom and power as exceeding those of ordinary men, asked his good offices in securing from a brother a larger share of paternal inheritance. He may have been a younger brother, whose smaller portion of the father's goods did not satisfy. Or he may have suffered injustice at the hands of his brother and his request involve only what the law gave him a right to demand. It matters not which was the case. The pity was that he could find no higher use for this divine Teacher than to help him get money. He had perceived that the word of Jesus was accompanied with power. It healed the sick, cleansed the leper, comforted the sorrowing, gave peace to the penitent. He would enlist it in his own service. "Master, speak to my brother." Surely, that voice would force the shekels from his unwilling hands. Thus do men seek to-day to make merchandise of Religion is sometimes holy things. valued according to its power to bring earthly rewards. The politician counts on getting all the votes of his church, though before he ran for office he gave neither his presence nor his money to its support. The merchant expects "the brethren." to trade with him whether he gives them as much for their money or not. The city pastor receives frequent visits from the stranger who "used to be a member of the church back in Blankville," who has not darkened the doors of a church for years, until he found himself without visible means of support, when he suddenly claims the relationship which he has so grossly neglected. If the relief is given he probably does not show himself in the church again till he happens to need another "lift." If his request is denied, he goes away prating loudly of the rarity of Christian charity and condemning the church to which he has perhaps never given an hour of honest service or a dollar of money.

Jesus' answer strikes at the root of the matter. "Man, who made me a judge or a divider over you?" These petty concerns may be left to earthly courts for settlement. My mission is to cultivate the spiritual appetite of man till he shall think of something else than what he shall eat and what he shall drink and wherewithal he shall be clothed. The carnal request of this man betrayed a heart so filled with the lust of worldly goods that it had no room for the sublime blessings of which the Savior had been teaching men. The altar of God had been overthrown within his heart, and he had become a worshiper of Mammon, for he was covetous, and covetousness is idolatry.

Turning to the company about him, the Master utters the solemn and much-needed warning against the sin of covetousness. The love of money is a root of all kinds of evil, the Arostle Paul tells us. They that desire to be rich fall into a temptation and a snare and many foolish and hurtful lusts, such as drown men in destruction and perdicion. Many are the wrecks of human lives due to this greed for gain. Jesus might well have urged the peril of making wealth the chief end of life. But he chose rather to enforce his message from the opposite standpoint. He gives as the reason for one's keeping himself from covetousness the fact that there is something so vastly better to seek after. "A man's life consisteh not in the abundance of the things which he possesseth." What a rebuke to the spirit of the age in which we live! How many are there whose chief ambition is to heap up thingshouses, lands, silver, gold jewels, raiment-anything that can minister to pride or luxury. Mere things are these, which lie on the surface of life and enter not into its real structure. Life is made up of high thoughts, noble deeds, worthy character, and these cannot be purchased with gold. Not what we get, but what we do and arethis determines whether our lives are abundant or meager. For the body little is required. "Having food and raiment, let us be therewith content." For the soul too much cannot be sought. The spiritual appetites grow ever by what they feed upon, and an infinite supply waits to satisfy the hunger and thirst for righteousness.

The parable that follows enforces all these practical lessons. A certain rich man finds his crops so abundant that they cannot be contained in the storehouses already built, so he determines to tear down the old and build new and larger ones. When he has filled them he will sit at his ease and enjoy the abundance and thus expect to find his life complete and satisfied. He reaches this decision not without some controversy with his better nature. He asks himself, "What shall I do?" Perhaps conscience speaks, somewhat in the words of the learned Ambrose, commenting on this incident: "Thou hast barns—the bosoms of the poor, the houses of widows, the mouths of infants-these are the barns which will last forever." The poor are all about him and he cannot have been ignorant of their need. But he loves his riches and he loves himself. He counts these gifts of Providence as though his own hands had created them. "My fruits" and "my goods" he calls them. He ignores the fact of his stewardship, as do thousands to-day. He has made provision for his flash, to fulfill the lusts thereof, and now he is ready for the feast.

That very night, after his plans for selfish gratification were completed, he was stricken by a fatal disease and through the chambers of conscience echoed the voice of God, saying: "Thou fool! this night thy soul shall be required of thee: then whose shall those things be which thou hast provided?" He was speechless and could only shrink back in horror from that journey which he must take, but for which he had made no provision. He had forgotten that every grave and every funeral procession thundered into his ears that he must die. Men are just as foolish now. "So is every man that layeth up treasure for himself and is not rich toward God." Shall we not search our own hearts and ask, each for himself, "Lord, is it I?" To make life but a ceaseless scramble for riches is to utterly wreck the soul's fairest hopes. To use it for the development of ourselves in righteousness and the ministering of good to others is to truly live.

Catarrh Cannot Be Cured

Catarrh Cannot Be Cured with LOCAL APPLICATIONS, as they cannot reach the seat of the disease. Catarrh is a blood or constitutional disease, and in order to cure it you must take internal remedies. Hall's Catarrh Cure is taken internally, and acts directly on the blood and mucous surfaces. Hall's Catarrh Cure is not a quack medicine. It was prescribed by one of the best physicians in this country for years, and is a regular prescription. It is composed of the best tonics known, combined with the best blood purifers, acting directly on the mucous surfaces. The perfect combination of the two ingredients is what produces such wonderful results in curing Catarrh. Send for testimonials, free.

TOPIC FOR SEPT. 16.

THE BROAD WAY; THE NAR-ROW WAY.

(Matt. 7:13, 14.)

Perhaps no one of Jesus' remarkably quotable tterances has been more imbedded in our langage than this of the broad way and the narrow. Iverybody understands in an instant what is neant by the strait and narrow read, and the hanges have been rung on it from the days of he apostles till John Bunyan, and even till now. To simple it is, so lucid, and therefore so attractive.

The broad road stands for ease of entrance. It is difficult to keep out of broad roads. As one valks in the alleys and narrow streets of a city and comes upon a great wide street, the tendency is irresistible to turn to right or left into it. Or, is one walks the fields and woods and finds the y-paths running towards or into one larger path, ne cannot stay out of the broad road.

But it often stands for hard, dusty and hot ravel, after all. Attractive though it may apear, yet the broad way is often congested with ravel, beset with dangers, filled with blazing heat and choking dest.

So cur Lord's picture of life, the "primrose ath of dalliance," as Shakespeare has it, is at rst irresistible; it is easier to enter than not. o easy a thing it is to drift and wander and natrally fall into wide beaten tracks of wrong, "beause other people do." But once in how hard re road becomes—the transgressor's way! Is he wrong-doer ever content in his sin? Is he appy? Does he not choke with the dust of disatisfaction, scorch with the heat of a burning onscience and jostle against the hard shoulders f selfishness on every hand?

Most of us drift into the wide road—not through ny particular viciousness or wickedness, but just brough thoughtlessness and lack of foresight. Ve do not see the end from the beginning. We o not perceive whither the broad way tends. Our Lancelots and your Guineveres are not intending to go over the falls of wickedness. They simly drift in the lazy, happy, sunny, thoughtless ummer afternoon, down the wide current, until efore they are aware they are in the rapids and so late to pause!

But the Narrow Road. It is hard at first to nd. One must sometimes get down upon his nees in the search. He must carefully look and sel about like an Indian seeking a trail, until he nds the footprints leading aright. He will have ifficulty at first in finding the difference between he right and the wrong. The footsteps of wellnown men that very much resemble the upright vill lead him wrong. But he must come back unlabel.

Further, just as the Broad Way grows harder, o does the narrow grow easier. The path of the ust shines brighter and brighter unto the perfect ay. For a time it may seem very stony, but oon a clover springs in the cleft and then a stonerop, then green moss and fern, and soon the resence of the Lily of the Valley, the Rose of haron, fills all the way with fragrance and joy. Let it not be thought for a moment, however, hat the way will cost no effort. No road that is vorth traveling at all is altogether easy-no road hat gets anywhere. There will be hard strugcles, sweat and stonebruises, falls, disasters, losngs of the trail. But, as compared with any ther road, the Narrow Way is easy beyond comare. "My yoke is easy and my burden light."

These things, then, are offered here by way of suggestion on this beautiful old lesson: The Broad Road stands for ease of entrance and difficulty of travel; the Narrow Way for difficulty of entrance and ease of travel.

Buffalo, N. Y.

Kansas State Convention.

Adjoining the town of Ottawa, Kas., is located Forest Park. Nature has done much for this lovely place and beautified it with tall oak and walnut trees, and covered it with shady elm and ash. Then came the hand of art and placed walks and drives through these grounds, built cottages, hotels, iron fencing and conveniences for the comfort of man. The entrance gate was beautified, large beds of flowers were planted and everything was done to make man feel and enjoy rest while sojourning in this beautiful park. This was the meeting-place of the Kansas State Missionary Convention. Here, for many days, the C. W. B. M., the Bible-schools, the Y. P. S. C. E. and the State Mission proper heard reports, addresses, gathered for devotional services and listened to the discussion of various practical subjects.

The program was a very extensive one and contained the names of near sixty persons. The range of subjects seemed almost as broad as there were numbers of persons to speak. F. E. Meigs, China, and G. L. Wharton were present to represent the Foreign Society. Their addresses were full of instruction and received by appreciative audiences. The general Home Mission work was represented by its secretary, Benj. L. Smith. He made a strong appeal for the home field, and the audience manifested its hearty approval of the work being done. A great work is being done through the Home Board, and this field deserves the liberal support of the whole brotherhood. Prof. Geo. P. Coler, Ann Arbor, Mich., delivered a series of addresses on Bible themes. His subjects were taken mostly from the Gospel of John. They were opening up the Scriptures to the people rather than addresses. These Bible talks were not only instructive, but they seemed to warm the hearts of those present and create a desire to want to know more about the Word of God. Prof. Coler, as well as the other speakers spoken of above, endeared himself to the convention by his splendid work. T. A. Abbott, state secretary, represented Missouri on the program. His stirring address gave great pleasure to the audience. We can heartily commend the program committee for having an address on "Our Religious Literature." More of them are needed.

As to the home forces on the program, we can simply say here that there is youth, vigor and culture in the Kansas pulpit. A number of addresses delivered are worthy of special mention. If the present ministers will remain with the Kansas churches there is every reason to believe that our cause in the state will come to the front. Their addresses indicated that they were men of action and true to the Word of God.

The reports showed that carefal and solid work was being done. There is not as many additions to the churches as in some former years, but the work is taking on a more permanent phase and the weak churches are being strengthened. Among other things eleven new preachers in the state were introduced to the convention, all comparatively young men. It is hoped that these will stay with Kansas in their work for the Master. If there were any old men at the convention at all, among the preachers, these were Brethren Ireland, Shively and Babbitt. W. S. Priest, of Atchison, tried to place himself in this class by referring to a picture taken some years ago, but he could make no one present accept any such classification. Bro. Rubenstien seemed to be somewhat "anti" on "old" foreigners, but before the convention was over he gracefully accepted the fact that three-fourths of the Kansans preachers were foreigners, and the N. I. Thomas, a former schoolmate of the writer, and E. M. Carr, a youth in a congregation where we labored in the long ago, are among the active forces in the state.

Berethren Mallory of the Third Church in Topeka and Milton, Ft. Scott, are holding the longest pastorates. That is right, brethren—be real elders (pastors) in your churches.

W. A. Parker, Emporia, and F. W. Emerson are among the strong recent accessions in the state.

W. Chenault makes a fatherly figure and an excellent presiding officer of the convention. D. S. Kelley presided with enthusiasm over the Y. P. S. C. E. period, and Sister Libbie F. Engels was the graceful chairman of the C. W. B. M.

The convention enjoyed the presence of Miss Mollie Hughes, Independence, Mo., superintendent of Junior Endeavor in Missouri, and R. H. Waggener, Kansas City. Both made talks to the convention.

The C. W. B. M. in the state are fully enlisted in establishing a Bible Chair at Lawrence in connection with the state university. The prospects are full af promise for success and some work has already been done.

Mrs. Louise Kelley, national organizer, was with the ladies in their convention and delivered several addresses to the delight of those present. Mrs. M. C. Rogers, Nortonville, is doing a telling work as organizer in the state.

A very pleasant feature of the convention was an ice cream social tendered the delegates by the good sisters of the Ottawa church. Out under the shade of the trees in the beautiful park we enjoyed the fellowship of each other and the hospitality of the church.

Sorry we missed the closing hours of the convention, but can say that the convention goes to Hutchinson in 1901 and W. Chenault continues president. The future seems bright and all seem hopeful.

BOOK NOTES.

Dodd, Mead & Co. announce a work on the Chinese Problem, by Chester Holcombe, author of "The Real Chinaman." Mr. Holcombe was connected with the United States Legation at Pekin, China, as interpreter and secretary, and in other capacities from 1871 to 1885; and since that time he has been concerned with extensive commercial and financial questions in that country. In his new book he deals with the peculiar character and conditions of the Chinese which have produced the present uprising.

McClure, Phillips & Co. have acquired the publication rights of a remarkable book, which claims Abraham Lincoln as its author. It is a small scrapbook compiled by Lincoln for use in the political campaign of 1858, and it contains, so Lincoln writes in it, "the substance of all I have ever said about negro equality," with explanatory notes and a long letter in Lincoln's handwriting.

Dodd, Meade & Co. have decided to publish Marie Corelli's "Master Christian," at the end of August, unless something unforseen should occur. The advance orders for the book have been very heavy, and in England the publishers' orders have been well nigh unprecedented.

Edwin Markham's "Second Book of Poems." which will be issued from the press of McClure, Phillips & Co. early in October, will contain several poems not before published. The note of hopefulness runs through the verses in this volume quite in contrast to the pessimism which some critics read into "The Man With the Hoe."

The Prohibition party has published a handbook for campaign purposes containing its platform, sketches, pictures, letters of acceptance and much statistical matter. Price, ten cents per copy.

SEPTEMBER MAGAZINES.

Scribner's for September is an ideal magazine. Its combination of fact and fiction makes it an especially interesting and instructive number.

China and Japan occupy prominence in the Missionary Review of the World for September. Their various conditions and problems are ably treated by prominent writers.

One of the most popular features of the Ladies' Home Journal is its fine full-page illustrations of life, nature's wonders and human skill, etc.; and in this respect the September number is unexcelled.

In the Century for September is a timely article by Rev. D. Z. Sheffield, D. D., on the "Influence of the Western World on China." Dr. Sheffield was for thirty years a missionary in the Middle Kingdom and writes from personal experience and knowledge of the situation.

The place of honor in the September Atlantic is given Judge Lowell's paper on the American Boss. Recent events have emphasized the importance of the "boss" in American politics; Judge Lowell explains him by showing how the source of his power and the extent of his influence are related to our general political system.

In the September Review of Reviews will be found a comprehensive treatment of the "Imperialism" issue, with particular reference to Mr. Bryan's Indianapolis speech. The editor's review of Mr. Bryan's Philippine propositions will be read with interest alike by the adherents and the opponents of the Democratic candidate's policy.

A magazine that is steadily forging ahead and winning golden opinions is the Woman's Home Companion, which in the September number substantiates its claim to excellence in several articles of notable merit. "The Woman's Daily Paper in Paris" is the leading article, contributed by Edward Page Gaston.

A striking portrait of Field Marshal Count von Waldersee, now on his way to China to become commander of the allied forces there, is presented in the September magazine number of the Outlook, together with many other pictures relating to the present crisis in China. $3 a year; the Outlook Company, New York.

From cover to cover the contents of Everybody's Magazine for September are the most interesting of any issue of that remarkable periodical yet pub lished. In praise of the cover itself too much cannot be said of the beauty of its design, which is not only effective but quite original; the march of improvement in the progress of printing is nowhere better shown than in this specimen of multi color

The opening article in the September Journal of Suggestive Therapeutics, published by the Psychic Research Company, Times-Herald Building, Chicago, from Alexander Wilder, M. D., of Newark, deals with the perils of premature burial. Dr. Wilder places little reliance, apparently, upon physicians' certificates of death and quotes several ghastly examples to support his position. The publishers announce that they will send free copies to all who apply until the stock is exhausted. Make a note

The first fall number of the Ledger Monthly has on its cover a trim figure of a pretty girl at the seaside, with a bouquet of vellow flowers on her bosom, and a lovely background of sea and sky finishing a picture full of beauty. The frontispiece of this number is a picture of a young lady in a colonial room, dressed in the costume of colonial days, watching one of the old-time clocks with a wistful expression. The title of the picture is "Will He Never Come?" Published by Bonner's Sons, New York, at 50 cts. a year.

Ist. Every comfort within the home, and attractive opportunity for lawn tennis, basket-ball, and other out-door sports on our well kept campus. An efficient health matron with hospital training.

2nd. Jesus Christ is presented as the source of all true and abundant life.

3rd. Our courses of study lead up to those offered in the higher colleges and universities. Our students are received on certificate at Cornell University, Vassar College and Wellesley' College. This fact speaks for itself as to the standard of our work.

4th. Our students meet in the class-room a body of enthusiastic, skilled instructors, who hold their degrees from such institutions as Cornell University, Bryn Mawr College, Vassar College, etc. The faculty is abreast of the times in standards and methods, and is qualified to arouse and to direct the intellectual ambitions of students.

5th. Well-equipped Chemical and Physical Leboratories, good Library and abundantly supplied Reading-room.

5th. Music and Art Departments well equipped.

7th. Madison Institute is designed for and seeks to enroll as students studious girls of mental ability and ambition. The school will not be popular with those who are "going away to school" for the name of the thing. Students are happy here; trificrs—an less specially converted—are not in congenial surroundings.

Baking Powder

In Use the most Economical

Greater in leavening strength, a spoonful raises more dough, or goes further.

Working uniformly and perfectly, it makes the bread and cake always light and beautiful, and there is never a waste of good flour, sugar, butter and eggs.

Wheeling Through Europe.

In his first sentence the writer says to the tourist who is "considering whether or not to go on a bicycle tour for a summer vacation," his advice is, "Go." So my advice in taking up this book [inquirely as to "worth while," is to "read it." Each chapter grows more fascinating as you jauntily roll along. The account of "things Dutch" impressed me as peculiarly full of humor and charm. But the description of Italy is the piece de resistance. The book is frought with biographical and historical references which show a wide range of research and makes it quite instructive, and we feel we have this much extra. The writer has [certainly risen to pre-eminence among modern descriptionists. Some of the situtions are lludicrously funny, others impressive in their beauty. It is a cleverly written book.

The building where the sessions of the convention are to be held is located at the corner of Nigara-Avenue and Tenth Street. From the New York Central (south end) Depot take a north-bound Main Street carto Nigara Avenue. Walk one block east on Niagara Avenue and arrive at the church.

Lodging and breakfast will be furnished free by the church. Other meals will cost 25 cents each and will be served within two blocks of the church building.

It is earnestly desired that we have a large delegation from each church in the state. From recent communications we have reason to believe that we shall not be disappointed. A large attendance will create an enthusiasm for New York State Missions as nothing else can. This can be secured if some one in each congregation be appointed with a view to working up a large delegation from bis own field. Then let him notify as soon as possible and from time to tima Bro. M. W. Richardson, of 1821 Ontario Avenue. Niagara Falls, as to the number and names of those who will attend.

CURRENT EVENTS.

There is an increasing probability that the United States troops will soon be withirawn from Pekin and probably from China altogether. This probability rests upon three facts of recent occurrence: First, the return of Prince Ching, the Chinese Emperor's Peace Commissioner, to Pekin; second, the formal authorization of Li Hung Chang by imperial edict to act as minister plenipotentiary for the conclusion of peace with one or all of the Powers; third, General Chaffee's advice that United States' roops be withdrawn as the best means of estoring conditions favorable to the conlusion of peace. The Imperial household s still in retirement at Pao Ting Fu, but the case is very materially altered now that Earl Li has been definitely commissioned to reat with the Powers. He will doubtless e recognized by the United States. Meanvhile Russia is still continuing her preparaions for withdrawal and the course of the ther Powers is problematical.

President McKinley's letter accepting the nomination for President, which was made ublic September 9, contains a comprehenive and able survey of the history of the ast four years, the present condition of the ountry and the issues of the present cam-While explicitly disclaiming the urpose of estimating the relative imporance of the issues, he emphasizes the fact hat the financial doctrine of the Chicago latform is reiterated in the present Demoratic platform and that it must be considred as a serious issue, if the party is to beaken in good faith. The danger to the gold tandard is not passed so long as the free ilver doctrine is a plank in the platform. he President reviews the present condition f the treasury, which is found to be proserous. The revenues and surplus have acreased during the past year, and expendiures have decreased. The volume of curency has increased during the past four years om $21.10 to $26.85 per capita, in spite of redictions that it would be contracted. he value of our exports for the present ear is greater by half a million dollars a ay than last year. The balance of rade for the present fiscal year amounts $544,000,000. The dealings of the adinistration with Porto Rico and the revival business there under the regime are ceated briefly. The bulk of the document given up to a history and defense of the dministration policy in the Philippines.

The threatened coal strike in the anthraite region of Pennsylvania has been postoned a few days, and there is a possibility that it may not be put into effect. The men demand "twenty per cent. increase in wages, the reduction in the price of powder from $2.75 to $1.50 a keg, a fair system of dockage, a fixed ton, abolishment of company stores, company doctors and butchers, no favoritism and the correction of minor grievances." The operators deny the abuses which are charged in connection with company stores; claim that extra pounds must be required (in addition to the 2,240 which constitute a ton of cleaned coal) when the coal is roughly mined, and say that the wages are already as high as they can afford. The strike, if it occurs, will be one of great magnitude, involving, directly or indirectly, a million workers and a weekly wage of $10,000,000. By far the greater number of the men, it is claimed, do not want to strike and will do so only if ordered.

There were two significant state elections during the past week, namely, those of Arkansas and Vermont. Of course, the fact that the Democrats carried the former and the Republicans the latter has not in itself a specially significant political symtom, but the majorities in the two states may indicate something. Jefferson Davis was elected governor of Arkansas by a majority of about 57,000. Bryan's majority over Mc-Kinley in the same state four years ago was 72,500. The reduction of the Democratic majority is at least partly accounted for by the fact of a lighter vote this year, but Republican papers try to find in it also an encouraging indication for the coming national election. In Vermont, Stickney, Republican, was elected by about 32,000 majority. In 1896 the Republican majority was 37,000, which was, however, abnormally large. Vermont is considered by political forecasters to be a good political barometer. With a Republican majority of more than 23,000 in Vermont a Republican national victory has never failed in the last thirty years, while a majority of less than that number has always been followed by a Democratic vic-

In the state election in Maine on Monday of this week, Dr. John F. Hill, Republican, was elected Governor by a majority of 31,000. This is considerably less than McKinley's majority in 1896, but is twice as great as the average Republican majority in Maine from the close of the war until Bryan's first candidacy. The increase of the Democratic vote over last year is ascribed to the return of many gold Democrats to the fold in the belief that the silver question is practically a dead issue.

Great satisfaction has been occasioned in Democratic circles by ex-Secretary Olney's letter, in which he declares himself in favor of Mr. Bryan. In doing so he assumes that neither the silver question nor expansion is the "paramount issue," but rather the question of trust legislation. It is, of course, known that Mr. Olney is opposed to the free silver doctrine. It is also known that he is, or was very recently, in favor of expansion. His letter judiciously avoids reference to these subjects, and dwells in rather general terms on the subservience of the Republican party and its present candidate to the interests of consolidated capital. It is a somewhat striking fact that Mr. Olney was an expansionist even before there had been any expansion. An article by him, published in the Atlantic Monthly before Dewey entered Manila Bay, declares that our period of national isolation is over and that henceforth we must be a factor in world politics, and in another article in the same magazine in March of this year, he shows the inevitableness of the course which has put us in possession of islands in the Pacific. Unless Mr. Olney has experienced a change of heart within the last six months, and he does not say that he has, it must be that he considers trusts the "paramount issue." It would be unkind to suggest that his declaration was inspired by a desire for a place in the band-wagon. We do not for a moment impute that motive to Mr. Olney, but it is nevertheless highly possible that many oldtime Democrats, who are neither free silver men nor anti-expansionists, will adhere to the party this year in the belief that, if it is defeated, there will be a grand reconstruction before the next campaign and that there will be an opportunity for them to participate in that reorganization. It is a noteworthy fact that Mr. Cleveland, who is out of politics and does not care to participate in anything, is not taking sides in the present campaign, though there have been loud calls for a positive declaration since Mr. Olney's letter. Mr. Olney is a man of the highest character who has rendered distinguished service to the country and his endorsement of the Democratic platform will doubtless win many votes for it.

Almost every paper which one picks up contains long lists of names of eminent men who are going to vote for the other party this year. If it is a Republican paper, the names are those of Democrats who will vote for McKinley. If it is a Democratic paper, they are names of former Republicans who will vote for Bryan. The fact that this new allignment is taking place is highly creditable to the intelligence of American voters. Why should it be assumed that, because a man voted for free trade twenty years ago, he should oppose expansion and the gold standard now? What logic is there which makes a man an expansionist by virtue of the fact that he has always favored protection? The issues between the two parties are new and the fact that changes of party affiliation are taking place so numerously is an indication of a healthy freedom from that form of political traditionalism which holds a man to his party organization and party name irrespective of the issues which they may represent.

Does trade follow the flag? It has in Porto Rico. Recently published statistics show that during the first three months, under the Porto Rician tariff, the imports from that island increased fifty per cent. over the corresponding months of last year, when peace had been restored and the island was under the American flag but still under the old tariff; and that they were three times as great as in corresponding months during the later years of Spanish rule. Exports to Porto Rico are two and one-half times as great as they were twelve months ago, and five times as great as during the later years of Spanish sovereignty. Here, at least, is one instance in which trade has followed the flag with a

There has recently come to light the text of a declaration issued by Aguinaldo and dated June 24. It is of the nature of a forecast of the possible results of our November election. The most interesting point is the dictator's assurance that if Bryan is elected the United States will withdraw its forces and grant complete independence to the Filipinos. This was before Mr. Bryan's Indianapolis speech. It is shocking to think what disappointment will come to the heart of the insurgent leader when he peruses that document and discovers that his champion proposes to grant independence by establishing a stable form of government. If there is anything which Aguinaldo does not want it is a stable form of government, established by any one except himself.

One of the best critiques of Mr. Bryan's Philippine policy, as set forth in his Indianapolis speech, is that which appears in the current number of the Review of Reviews. Mr. Bryan specifically defines, under three points, the course which he would pursue toward the Philippines if he were President: (1) Establish a stable form of government; (2) grant complete independence; (3) afford protection from outside interference. The incompatibility of these three points is obvious. If the granting of complete independence really means all that word carries on its face, it means giving the Filipinos a right to establish their own government, stable or unstable, as they may prefer. The recognition of the principle of "government by the consent of the governed" gives the Filipinos a chance to block the very first step of Mr. Bryan's course by refusing their consent to the stable form of government, which he would establish. But even if this difficulty did not happen to arise, if the independent Filipinos chose to accept the statble form of government which was established for them, the United States, certainly could not undertake to protect that government from all outside interference unless it maintained enough control to be able to guarantee the maintenance of a government which would not need to be interfered with. The persons, rights and property of all foreigners must be protected. If the local government does not do it, there is bound to be interference by that government whose subjects are mistreated. The United States cannot prevent such interference unless it is willing to exercise such control over the local government as will secure the safety of the foreigners. This is, to say the least, independence with a string to it. The matter comes to this, then, that Mr. Bryan's first and third points are in substantial agreement with the policy which is being actually pursued by the present administration, while his second point is inconsistent with either of the others. On the whole, Mr. Bryan's pronunciamento is a very cheering document, for it assures us in the first and third points above mentioned that he has a sense of the practical requirements of the situation and that, if the executive responsibility were placed upon him, these practical considerations would outweigh the general propositions about the "inherent rights of man."

The calamity which has befallen Galveston, Texas, is one of the most destructive to human life, that has occurred in this country during the century. Situated on a low, sandy island, scarcely rising above the sea level under normal conditions, the city was in no position to resist the terrific onslaught of wind and water which came upon it Saturday and Sunday, when a hurricane from the southwest heaped upon it the waters of the Gulf. The city is almost a total wreck, and the loss of life, which cannot yet be accurately estimated, can scarcely be less than 3.000 in Galveston and vicinity. Assistance has been promptly sent by neighboring cities, by private individuals and by the Federal Government, but, in spite of all that can be done, there will be terrible suffering on the part of the survivors, who are now without either food or fresh water, before communications can be opened up with the stricken city. It is a time for the exercise of human sympathy in its most practical form, not only in sorrow for the dead, but in succor for the living.

The Atlantic Ocean continues to narrow. A new record for steamships eastward has been established. The Deutschland has shortened the time three hours and twentyone minutes. Last week she crossed the Atlantic in five days, eleven hours and forty-five minutes. Her average speed for the passage was 23.32 knots. Her highest day's run was 552 knots. In view of this remarkable speed the following account of this steamer from the Chicago Record will be interesting:

The Deutschland is 686½ feet long over all, 67 feet wide and 44 feet deep. If it were stood on end it would tower more than 100 feet over an edifice twice as high as Trinity Church, New York Its registered tonnage is 16,000 and its displacement is 23,000 tons. The new liner is equipped with bronze twin screws twenty-three feet in diameter and two quadruple expansion engines of 35,000 horse power. Twelve double and four single-end boilers will supply the steam and there will be 112 fires. There are six decks, built of steel and teakwood, and over these rise four funnels and two steel masts. The vessel can accommodate 467 first-cabin, 300 second-cabin and 300 steerage passengers.

AN OBJECT-LESSON.

The condition of things in China, growing out of the feeling of hostility in that country toward the people of other countries sojourning in their midst, whom they designate as "foreign devils," is an object-lesson of world-wide significance. Nothing was more characteristic of the world at the time when Christ came into it than racial prejudices, and bitterness of feeling between peoples of different nations and languages. The very word for stranger signified an enemy in the Roman tongue. Christianity set for itself the task of breaking down these bitter walls of partition, obliterating all feelings of hatred growing out of differences of nationality, language or of blood, and of implanting in their stead the feeling of universal brotherhood.

One of the earliest triumphs of Christianity was in building churches out of Jews and Gentiles, at one time hostile to each other, and of binding them together in the bonds of a common brotherhood, through faith in and loyalty to a common Master. No more striking proof of the divine power of the Christian religion could have been furnished in that age than the spectacle of Jews and Gentiles, Greeks and barbarians, bond and free, male and female, dwelling together in brotherly love and fellowship. Wherever Christianity has gone in anything like its native purity it has succeeded in breaking down barriers of caste, of nation and of race, and fostering the spirit of mutual respect and of brotherhood. It is due to Christianity that the people of Christian nations are quickened to send relief to any part of the world where human beings are in peril or in want. Christianity does not stop at national boundaries. It knows no geographical limitations; it offers its light and its blessing to all men everywhere without respect to nation, race, tribe or tongue

It is because of this characteristic of Christianity that the missionaries are in China, not seeking their own good or gain, but the welfare of China and its people. They are there at the sacrifice of the comforts of home and of civilization, because of their unselfish interest in the Chinese people, and in their desire to better their condition. Think of the awful contrast between a re ligion which inspires this sort of disinterest ed service and one which leads its votaries to perpetrate such outrages against their benefactors as the Chinese Boxers have inflicted on the Christian missionaries, who are there solely to benefit them! In this contrast we get some conception of the value of Christianity and of what it is able to do for men. If the recent outrages in China have no other effect, surely they cannot fail to serve as an object-lesson on the difference between the spirit of Christ and the spirit of paganism.

So far, therefore, from discouraging missionary efforts, this barbarous treatment of our missionaries and civil ministers in China will serve as a mighty incentive to Christian people everywhere to push the conquests of Christ's kingdom until the millions in China have come under its transforming power, and are able to recognize in the people of other nations who come among them, not "foreign devils," but children of a common Father and brothers of a common family, whose roof is the overarching sky and whose home is the whole round world.

There can be no such thing as universal peace until there is a general recognition among the nations of the earth, of the essential oneness of the human race and of the reality of human brotherhood, growing out of a common divine Fatherhood. Christianity is the only religion that has ever proved itself equal to the breaking down of international barriers and racial and tribal prejudices. It is the greatest unifying force in the world. Jesus Christ is the divine Magnet, gathering together the sundered fragments of alienated races, peoples and tribes, and uniting them to each other by uniting them to himself. Confucius must give place to Christ and race hatred to brotherly love. If the Chinese people could only realize it, therefore, they have themselves of late furnished the most striking proof of the necessity of carrying the gospel into China. The Christian people of other nations will not be slow to see the logic of these facts. In this way, we doubt not, it will turn out that these direful events in China will result in the furtherance of the gospel in that great empire, so surely does God cause the wrath of man to serve his divine purposes.

It will be said, of course, and truly enough, that there are not wanting evidences in our country of failure to recognize this common brotherhood of man, and that very many who have been reared in a land of Christian civilization, and whose names are recorded on our church books, treat each other in their business dealings and in their social relations as if they had nothing in common and were under no obligations to each other. This is only saying that Christianity has gained only a partial victory as yet in socalled Christian lands. The outrages perpetrated in China would not be possible here, but greed and avarice and tyranny of the flesh have their victims, even in our own land. In so far, however, as Christianity is permitted to have its way in legislation, in business and social life, a better state of things is being brought about, and when it shall have complete sway we shall behold a "new heaven and a new earth wherein dwelleth righteousness." This is "the one far-off divine event towards which the whole creation moves."

THE REIGN OF LAW.

It is well that Mr. Allen has written this "tale of the Kentucky hemp fields," which is more accurately a tale of what the author conceives to be religious intolerance. Not that it is a good book, or a true book, or a book exceptionally well written; but it is a book which it was inevitable that some one would write sooner or later, and Mr. Allen has done it, perhaps, as well as any one would. The fact that sixty thousand copies have been sold in a single summer gives us a right to assume, perhaps, that most readers will be familiar with the story, by hearsay at least; but it can be told in a nutshell. In the year 1865 a boy goes from a pious home in the Kentucky hemp fields to the newly founded College of the Bible of Kentucky University. He has the strong, unreasoning faith of a child, and he wants to be a preacher. The conflicting opinions of different denominations, as set forth by their ministerial representatives in Lexington, drive him into doubt. He seeks relief by reading Darwin and Spencer; issues in the declaration that he does not believe in the Bible or in Christianity; is dismissed from the Bible College and goes back to the hemp fields. The love story, wherein he meets and marries a girl who assures him that it makes no difference whether he believes or not, has no particular relevance to the rest of the book. Probably even the author would not deliberately maintain that domestic felicity is a solvent for all religious perplexities.

The thing which is represented as taking place in the career of David when the old faith came in contact with new facts (new to him) is unquestionably the thing which has taken place in the mind of many a young man, who has come suddenly into a larger intellectual life. The extraordinary circumstance is that this partial process, this mere disturbance of the ancient faith, with no subsequent readjustment or reconstruction, should be represented as a normal and complete process, and that the man who so far failed to digest his Darwin that it remained a stumblingblock to his Christianity, should be held up to admiration as a strenuous and lofty character. If the book had been anonymously published, we would say without hesitation that it was the work of some one who had just heard about evolution within the past year, had seen that it was a great idea. but had not yet learned what to do with it. The conception of evolution and its religious significance, which it involves, is as crude as its conception of Christianity.

The limitation of the author's thought, his failure to see that modern science leaves room for any real faith, is exhibited clearly enough in the following sentence: "The voices of these three literatures filled the world; they were the characteristic notes of that half century, heard sounding together: The Old Faith, the New Science, the New Doubt. And they met at a single point; they met at man's place in Nature, at the idea of God, and in that system of thought and creed which is Christianity."

There are some old things and some new things in the religious thought of our time—new to us at least as Darwin was new to David—and the struggle between the two, whether within one mind or between two opposing camps, is the most serious battle which most of us are called upon to fight. Intolerance is equally possible on either side. Intolerance in a college faculty may manifest itself in expelling the heretics. Intolerance in a novelist shows itself when characters are depicted without sympathy and are introduced only to be condemned.

It is no rash assertion to say that a man cannot write a great book, or a true book, or a tolerant book on this subject-the attitude of the adherents of the old faith to the followers of modern thought-who does not see that the New Science can be followed by something other than a New Doubt. True, he who has appropriated the result of modern science and modern thought in all its lines may never hold the same old faith in the same old way as when he dwelt among the shocks of hemp, ignorant of all that men have thought in the last nineteen centuries. But there is a New Faith following the New Science-not new in its content, or in its personal object, but new in its relation to the believer and new in its permanent certainty of all essential religious truth-that is not doubted by the strong souls who have gone through the storm and stress period. In view of this limitation of the author's thought, his charge of rank intolerance against Kentucky University and the Bible College, is profoundly inconsequential. To be sure, if a course of events exactly similar to that depicted in the book had ever actually happened it would show a great lack of wisdom on the part of those teachers and pastors who gave the boy up for lost when he was simply suffering from his first idea. But even if the main outlines of the story are historical, certainly the conversations are not, and the only question of toleration is the question whether the Bible College ought to set the seal of its approval upon a young man who frankly avows that he does not believe in the Bible or Christianity.

The present volume does not, to our mind, exhibit the magic touch of the literary artist which we are accustomed to look for in Mr. Allen's books. There is much description of nature in it, and here he is generally happy, though to our mind the hemp business is rather overdone for a book which purports to have any other purpose than the description of the raising of hemp. And yet it is a decided relief when the author ceases for a moment to talk about people and talks about things. He loves the things that he writes about, but for the people with whom he is dealing here, except David, he obviously has little sympathy. There is a covert sneer, or at least a curl of the lip, in all that is said concerning the Bible College and the churches of Lexington, and no man can paint a picture which will be substantially true in its inner spirit, if he fails to appreciate the solid value of the characters whom he depicts. The Reign of Law does not get above mediocrity as a pieceof literature; and as a study of religious life and experience it is so crude, and unsympathetic as to be esentially untrue.

THE DUTY OF THE YOUNG TO THE CHURCH.

(1 John 2:13, 14; 2 John 4.)

[Uniform Midweek Prayer-meeting Topic, Sept. 19.]

CENTRAL TRUTH: Obligations and duties are reciprocal; the church having so fur discharged its obligation to the young as to bring them within its bosom and under its influence, the young, on their part, owe some duties to the crurch.

One of the great revivals in modern times has been the revival of interest on the part of the church in behalf of the young. Some one has said that the discovery of woman is one of the greatest achievements of the century now closing; but the discovery of childhood, which has been within the same period, is of no less importance. The Sunday-school, the Christian Endeavor Society, the Young Men's and Women's Christian Associations and various other orders and societies for young people are indications of the growing interest that the church is feeling for its young people. A vast amount of literature-books, periodicals and helps of various kinds-have sprung into existence as the result of this awakened interest in the welfare of the young.

It is only a fitting response to all this outlay of time and energy and talent in behalf of young people that they should recognize the obligations which they are under to the church and the duties which they owe to it. As they have been dependent on the church for its influence and guidance in their tender years, so the church is dependent upon them for its future triumphs. It is the duty of parents to support their children up to a given point, and afterwards it becomes the duty of the children to support their parents when old age has enfeebled them and made them dependent upon the assistance of others. A similar relationship exists between the church and her children.

The aged Apostle John, in writing to his brethren, says: "I have written unto you, little children, because ye know the Father." Again, "I have written unto you, young men, because ye are strong, and the Word of God abideth in you, and ye have overcome the evil one." Those who know the Father, and those who are strong in the Lord and in the power of His might, certainly owe duties to the church. The strength of youth, who can measure? It is the strength of faith unchilled by doubt; it is the strength of an all-conquering enthusiasm; it is the strength of an unwavering hope, and an optimism that never hesitates at difficulties. This is the dowery of youth! This is the inestimable treasure of the young! The church cannot fight i's battles, cannot adjust itself to new situations, cannot overcome the inertia of slothfulness and wage an aggressive campaign against the forces of evil without those elements of success which the young alone can bring to

> "So near is grandeur to the dust, So like is God to man, When Duty whispers low, Thou must, The youth responds, I can."

It is this capacity of youth to hear the whisper of duty calling it to deeds of daring, and responding thereto, "I can," that makes it so important an element in the church and places it under the most solemn obligations for service.

The young men to whom John wrote were strong, not only with the natural endowments of youth, but because the Word of God abode in them, giving direction and purpose to all their energies and powers. We have a great company of young people in our churches who, in Christian homes, in Sunday school, in Endeavor Society and in church have received the good Word of God into their hearts, and in proportion as they have received it and keep it they are strong for duty in every field of conflict with wrong and error. In the absence of this Word of God as the controlling factor in the lives of the young they are shorn of their strength and are incapable of any Christian service. Instead of overcoming the evil one they will be overcome by him.

The same apostle in his letter to the "elect lady and her children" says: "I rejoice greatly that I have found certain of thy children walking in truth, even as we received commandment from the Father." It was a matter of rejoicing to this aged apostle that the young had not only received the truth, but were walking in the truth. This it is that makes the young a power for good in any church or community.

What, then, are the duties of the young to the church? Among them are the following:

- 1. To become members of it through confession of faith in Christ and obedience to
- 2. Having received the truth of the Word of God, to walk in it, that they may grow in grace and in the knowledge of our Lord Jesus Christ. This involves the faithful attendance upon all the stated services of the church, and the willingness to bear their part in all its burdens and duties.
- 3. The young owe it to the church, and to Jesus Christ the Head of the Church, to select such callings in life as will enable them to best serve God and their fellowmen. This will lead some of them to be ministers of the Word at home, others to be missionaries abroad and still others to shed the light of Christian lives in the domestic circle, in their business relations and in their professional callings.
- 4. Finally, they owe it to the church to make the most of themselves, that by the silent influence of their lives and characters and by their good works they will glorify God and constrain others to share with them the influence of the gospel.

PRAYER.

We thank Thee, our Heavenly Father, for the awakened interest of the church in behalf of the young, and we thank Thee for the number of active young men and women and children who have been gathered into our churches, and have in them such possibilities of usefulness. We pray that these young people, thus delivered from the snares of the ϵ vil one, may consecrate their young lives to the building up of Thy church and to the extension of thy kingdom throughout the world. May all the wealth of their youth be laid upon the altar of service to Christ, and consecrated to high and worthy ends. And may the church of the future be far more potential in carrying out Thy purposes in the world than has been the church of the past, because of the consecrated young lives that have come into it and have been trained for Thy service. And this we ask for the honor of Thy name, through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen!

Editor's Easy Chair

Sitting out under the trees at "Rosehill" on a still starry night a few evenings ago, there came the clear, distinct notes of a cricket's song. In a flash of memory the scenes of the long past came before us at the magic note of this invincible songster. Who does not remember the cricket song on the hearth, at evening twilight, away back in early boyhood days? Who of us has not wondered where the cricket was? for while its song was quite audible, the singer was quite invisible. By what sort of magic can this cricket of the later generation, by its shrill notes, roll back the curtain of the past and bring before us scenes and faces of the long ago? Have you not noticed how a familiar odor of some old-fashioned flower has the power to conjure up and bring to memory your mother's garden with its oldfashioned hollyhocks, its sweet pinks, its bachelor buttons and touch-me-nota? What subtle power can there be in a breath of fragrance to bridge a chasm, it may be of half a century, and put you back in the garden of your boyhood? Some strange and little understood law of association, no doubt, must account for this phenomenon, but such a law implies a wonderful fact, namely, that on memory's plate are forever imprinted the impressions which have been made upon it through all the past, and it only requires the sound of a familiar note or the scent of an old-time flower to recall them vividly before the mind.

It has been suggested that under the operation of this law, by which not only the scenes but the very deeds of the past are recalled, that men are to be punished, and are punished, even in this life, for their misdeeds and neglected opportunities. Certainly the knowledge of such a law should stimulate every one to cultivate pure thoughts, to pursue noble ideals, and to fill life with kindly deeds. If it be true that—

"Of all sad words of tongue or pen, The saddest are these, It might have been,"

then it is worth while to spare ourselves the sadness of remembering neglected opportunities by improving them as they pass. Life is a succession of opportunities for doing good, and to pass through life, day by day, with no eyes to see these opportunities, or with no disposition to avail ourselves of them—this is not life. It is mere existence. It is to be feared, however, that many pass through life in this way, and will never realize what opportunities they have passed by unimproved, until they are awakened by the thunders of judgment, and memory is made to pass in review the doors of opportunity and calls to duty, which were passed by unheeded. Not to do well simply, but to do the very best possible, with the powers and capacities which God has given us, is the measure of our obligation.

It may seem a long way from the cricket's chirp to ecclesiastical reform, and yet the note sounded by the friction of the basal wings of the orthopterous insect, has brought us face to face with the question of neglected opportunities in our missionary work. Will any one affirm that the Disciples of Christ in the state of Missouri, for instance, are using the best means which God has put in their power for the furtherance of His cause and kingdom in our state? Perhaps there is none who does not realize, with more or less vividness, that we are not fulfilling the measure of our obligation. The leading religious people in the state in point of numbers, and quite equal to others in point of ability and intelligence, we ought to be doing things on a scale of much greater magnitude than we are doing at present, or have ever done in the past. For some reason our forces in this state have not been rallied and disciplined and led forward into an effective, aggressive campaign for truth and righteousness. In saying this we are only stating what every one acquainted with the facts in the case will admit. But what is the remedy? This is the question which should be faced and answered. Perhaps we have not planned to do large things. Is it not probable that we have permitted ourselves to run along with the same appliances and methods of operation which were well enough, perhaps, for a quarter of a century ago, but which are not adequate to meet the presest demands? We believe this to be true. Surely, the time has come when we ought to look this problem full in the face, and seek for some satisfactory solution of Having said this much we ought, perhaps, at least to drop a suggestion indicating the direction in which we think a remedy is to be found. We need in Missouri, and perhaps in many other states-but we speak more especially of Missouri's needs-a more effective organization. The rapid increase in our membership in the state has resulted in the formation of a large number of churches. too weak for self-support, many of which are without adequate pastoral care and guidance. How to care for these uncaredfor churches and promote their spiritual development and bring them into-harmonious co-operation, is the "paramount issue" in the state. Even many of our stronger churches are not co-operating through the State Board in the work of advancing the interest of our cause in the state. Nearly every great reform is to be accomplished by the force of some personality capable of coping with the situation. Perhaps the best remedy for the state of things we have described would be the selection and employment of one of the ablest and most influential men in the state, whose age, experience, wisdom and administrative ability would commend him to the confidence of all, as State Superintendent of Missions. This might be as good name as any by which to designate his work. It would be his duty to look after the weaker churches, group them together in circuits and assist them in securing competent and worthy men to shepherd them, to "set in order the things that are wanting," to stir up the churches of the state co-operation, not only in the work of the state, but to stimulate them in all their missionary contributions. Than this, no more important work could be assigned to any one, and certainly none that is calling for more prompt action. This need not interfere with the present arrangement for a state corresponding secretary, though it might well modify the duties which have hitherto been laid upon such officialy, if this addition to our present missionary method should involve the necessity of a change in the constitution of our missionary co-operation in this state, it would be easy to effect such change, provided the brethren feel that such a man as we have suggested appointed to such a work, would result in remedying, in some measure the evil to which we have referred.

Editor Christian-Evangelist:—In a recent issue of your paper you very frankly and boldly announced your purpose to vote for prohibition in the coming presidential campaign, as the paramount issue before the American people. Many of us who have been accustomed to vote otherwise, believing we could accomplish more practical good thereby, would like to know your reasons for voting a ticket which you know will not be elected. As you are generally, as it seems to us, actuated by reasonable motives in your course of action, we are curious to know what reasons you can give for this course,

We have no objection to answering this question frankly, but we realize that there is danger of being misunderstood in so doing. We do not believe for a moment that the reasons which influence our action in this matter will appeal to all our readers with the same force that they do to us. We have no condemnation to pronounce upon men who come to a different conclusion from what we do as to their political duty in the coming campaign. All that we ask or have ever asked of our readers and of Christian people generally is that they consider well the issues at stake and vote conscientiously as Christian people, casting such a ballot as they honestly believe will do most good for their fellowmen and bring greatest glory to Him whose name we wear. The editor of this paper has for more than a dozen years voted the prohibition ticket, and in doing so has been actuated by the following motives:

1. A vote is an expression, as we view it, of one's highest and truest convictions concerning public policy. There is no other way by which the deepest convictions as to what is the best public policy can be registered or made known except by the ballot. We have aimed, in our exercise of the right of suffrage, to express our convictions on what we regard as one of the most vital issues in American politics.

2. According to the testimony of judges and justices of high repute, intemperance is the source of by far the larger part of crime committed in this country. According to the highest medical testimony, it is injurious to the human system and the cause of many diseases and of frequent deaths. According to the best authority in economics it is one of the most prolific causes of poverty and of want among the people. By common consent the liquor traffic is the source, not only of individual wretchedness, but of domestic unhappiness and of political corruption. In the face of all these acknowledged facts the leading political parties of this country shun the problem of the liquor traffic. They are afraid to touch it. strong has the liquor power become in this country that politicians and political leaders become cowards in its presence and refuse to put one word in their political platforms which can be interpreted as antagonistic to this gigantic evil and prolific source of disease, crime, poverty and public debauchery. We detest the moral cowardice that prevents the political leaders of the old parties from assuming some attitude toward this great evil and proposing some sort of treatment of it. We have no way of expressing our opposition to such cowardly policy so effectually as at the ballot box.

3. We know of no way of bringing any influence to bear on either of the leading political parties to make them face this issue except by making the prohibition vote so large that politicians will respect and fear it. There are enough prohibitionists in this country, if they would act in concert, to hold the balance of power. If the makers of platforms knew that to shun this issue meant to lose the prohibition vote and knew that without such vote they could not hope to elect their ticket, then they would not dare to ignore what is really a paramount issue in American politics. For this reason we would be delighted to see a million votes registered the coming autumn in favor of prohibition. Nothing would do so much to call the attention of politicians to the threatening peril of the liquor traffic-peril to the party that ignores it as well as to the life of the nation.

4. It is an old trick of the Adversary to depreciate moral issues and magnify mere questions of policy. No Christian ought to be deceived by any such false estimate. He, at least, ought to know that moral questions are the great and vital questions with individuals and with nations. What issue is there before the American people to-day that involves to so great a degree the moral life of the people and of the nation as the question of the liquor traffic? believe there is none, and in so saying we do not underestimate the importance of the questions of public policy which are now before the country. But, believing as we do in the supremacy of moral issues, we shall endeavor to make our vote count on that issue, which more than any other, in our judgment, involves the moral welfare of the nation.

But, as stated in the beginning, we judge no man. We deprecate the disposition prevalent in all political parties and from which, we regret to say, prohibitionists are not exempt, to use harsh, uncharitable language and to form uncharitable judgments concerning the motives of others who differ from us as to what is political duty at the present time. If every reader of this paper casts his vote conscientiously after due consideration of his personal responsibility to God, we shall have no fault to find with his motive or his character, however much we may differ from him in judgment.

OUR EDUCATIONAL PROBLEM IN ENGLAND.

HERBERT L. WILLETT.

The greatest limitations under which our work in England rests is that of meagreness of educational facilities, such as would permit us to possess a force of men adequately trained for pastoral work and coming on in sufficient numbers to make the extension of our cause there practicable. We have no school in Great Britain. The result is that three or four alternatives are open to us. First, young Englishmen may come over here and enter our colleges, securing there the training which they need for ministerial work; but in most cases where this is done they are lost to the English churches, for they find it more advantageous to remain in America, and thus we on this side are strengthened while our English churches lose some of their best material. A second method is that of sending men from this side to become the pastors of the English churches. This has been pursued in large measure in the past and nearly all our churches there owe to one or more Americans their beginnings and some measure of the progress which they have made. In a former sketch of the English field the number of Americans who have done service of this character among our churches there was pointed out. But, of course, the limitation here is patent. It is a difficult thing to remain all one's life away from interests which are early and strong, and the result is that most of our American preachers who go to England return sooner or later. Some of them have stayed, indeed, only a few months, while others have been there several years; but it may almost be said to be the rule that they will return in the end. A third source of supply has been from institutions under other religious auspices in England. Notably is this the case with Spurgeon's College of Preachers. From this have come several of our best English workers. Of course, this school does not meet the educational ideals of the present time in any full measure, but it is something to have influenced England as profoundly as the Spurgeon idea, even with the limited resources at its disposal and with the modest standard which it sets up for ministerial equipment. The fourth expedient is the use of untrained men, at least those whose technical training so far as the ministry is concerned has been entirely omitted, or who have turned from other lines of work to take up the pastoral function.

It will be seen that none of these expedients are satisfactory, and that the work in England will suffer until such time as the deficiency shall be supplied by the creation of some adequate educational foundation under our own direction. No one who studies English religious life can fail to be impressed with the necessity of the educational factor in it. The most conspicuous example of the power which education places at the disposal of a religious communion is seen in the Church of England itself. This organization has within revival of activity and influence unparalleled since the days of the Restoration. The same church over which Arnold, of Rugby, mourned and which Sydney Smith ridiculed has grown in power until to day it is more strongly entrenched in English life than ever before, and probably disestablishment was never so far distant as at this moment. The causes of this revival of power are not far to seek. The Church of England has in later years persistently watched the young men of the land and has carefully selected those with moral earnestness and love of the truth and such as gave promise of ability and has trained them for her ministry. The system of preparatory schools and great universities in England has been almost wholly in the hands of the church. The greatest of church leaders have been men intimately connected with the school system. The seat of Canterbury fo. sixty years has been occupied by men who were former headmasters of the foremost English preparatory schools: Longley came from Harrow, Taite from Rugby, Benson from Wellington and Temple, the present archbishop, from Eton. All this has a tremendous significance. Boys of even non conformist families are freely sent to become members of cathedral choirs with the promise of scholarships in the church schools. This price their parents are willing to pay for the educational advantages offered, but with the result that in most cases the boys are trained in the thought and method of the church, and if they are promising they are pushed on through Oxford or Cambridge and are quite likely to enter the ranks of the clergy. This at once places the nonconformists at a great disadvantage. To be sure, the Congregationalists, Baptists and other denominations have their own colleges and theological institutes, but these in no sense compare in equipment with the great colleges at Oxford and Cambridge, which are for the most part Church of England schools.

If this educational disability is one which confronts all nonconformity it is particularly the case with our own work there, where we have not even a single college, however modest, to furnish forth our ministerial force. And this very fact is the cause of deep concern to the brethren who are leaders in our work there. It is a problem which they have tried for many years to solve. It is apparent that it is an unsatisfactory thing to be compelled to rely on our American colleges, for the reasons above set forth, and because of the extra expenses entailed in the long journey. Moreover, the conditions governing our educational life in America are so different from those in England that a student is in danger of being altogether misled as to his own fitness for the college work or the adequacy of the instruction likely to be afforded him. One of the young men in an English church came to America, attracted bp the glowing promises made by a school which has been widely advertised among us and found to his astonishment and chagrin that the entire course offered at the school afforded him in reality no work n advance of that which he had done in the English board school of the simplest type. He returned to England, having exhausted his funds in a fruitless journey. This, of course, may be called an exceptional case, and one due to the misfortune of trusting too much to alluring promises without learning the facts. It need not be added that no English student would run into a similar danger who came to attend any of our well-known and reputable schools.

But still we need a school on English soil. Two opportunities are open to us at the present time. It is, of course, wellknown that the recently organized Mansfield College at Oxford, which was the first non-conformist institution to be opened in that classical university city, has a thoroughly representative faculty under the competent and honored leadership of Principal Fairburn. It has long been the dream of some of our English brethren that we might do something at Oxford in the way of establishing a school. Funds to organize a college we have not, even on the most modest scale, and anything less than a competent and adequate beginning there would be a disaster rather than a help to our cause. The Oxford spirit is keenly sensitive to university traditions and resents anything that looks like a half equipped school. In an interview held with Principal Fairburn, in which the whole matter was canvassed, the possibilities of forming a connection with Oxford University through Mansfield College such as would give to us adequate means of securing the highest advantages for our students were considered, and a most cordial offer to extend the full courtesies of Mansfield College to a house organized in the vicinity and co-operating to the fullest degree with the college, while at the same time maintaining its separate organization and receiving instruction from its own dean, was made. This experiment would be inexpensive, and would secure all the advantages for which we could hope short of the ability to organize another Mansfield college, and this would require an equipment running up into the hundreds of thousands of pounds, and even more than this, men of the Oxford stamp, who like Principal Fairburn, could win their way in the conservative atmosphere of England's educational stronghold. All this, however, would be secured for us through the already organized work of Mansfield thus placed at our disposal.

But the problem still confronts us as to where the students would be found to enter such a house and to do this work. The educational standards of Oxford are very high. There is not a single young man in any of our English churches prepared to undertake so ambitious a task. Most of the young men to whom we could look as possible students in an institution of our own have only the most modest preparation, such as is furnished by the board schools, and does not extend beyond the eighth or ninth grade of the American public school. It is evident, therefore, that we cannot utilize as yet this offer from Oxford, but that we must turn our attention to some other plan which shall prepare students both for the ordinary work of the ministry and to become candidates for entrance to Oxford later on. Such a plan is pursued by the Congregationalists and the Baptists in connection with the University of Nottingham, a very competent foundation which has the usual faculties found in a university of the more modest character. The two schools organized in more or less close connection with Nottingham University have sent out great numbers of preachers to become active and representative members of the denominations named. The outlay required in the utilization of this plan would be comparatively small, and we would at once invite students of the most limited attainments to enter such a school taking whatever studies the university offers and pursuing such other special disciplines as we wish to teach in our own school or house. This plan is now under advisement by the English brethren, but even the assumption of so simple a plan requires an outlay which will tax severely our English churches, if indeed it is possible at all. It is scarcely possible that such a work can be inaugurated without assistance from this side of the ocean. Indeed, perhaps the very task of helping our English brethren to begin their educational work might quicken us to a new sense of responsibility regarding the schools here in the states. But it is safe to say that until some plan is devised which shall solve in some measure the problem of our educational needs in England our work will labor under limitations which will prevent it from ever assuming the place to which it is entitled and which it might otherwise attain.

Tho University of Chicago.

LOUIS CASS WOOLERY.

BURRIS A. JENKINS.

Louis Cass Woolery, brother of the lamented President W. H. Woolery, of Bethany College, was for years professor of Greek in that old and honorable institution. Later he taught in Drake, then in West Virginia University. No one who ever passed under the hand of Professor Woolery, in the Greek room, but was impressed by the personality of that gentle, refined, but marly

There is something about the study of Greek which seems to leave upon the character of those who engage in it extensively a lasting impression. It is a rare thing to find a professor of the classic Greek, thoroughly equipped for his chair, who is not in the best sense a gentle man, a refined, cultured, polished man; one who partakes, apparently, of the spirit of that great, beautyloving people he has so long lived with in spirit.

Something of this effect was very noticeable in the Professor, who so recently has left us, and so nething of this refined gentleness he imparted to each man who came under his instruction. If only his students could all have caught the full measure of his unaffected simplicity and honesty!

And yet, there was never any shirking of hard toil in the classroom of L. C. Woolery. Some, indeed, thought him severe upon first acquaintance. He was always exacting, but never unkind or unreasonable. I do not remember to have seen him lose his temper or full control of himself. He was dignified in the classroom, reserved and businesslike; outside of it he was a friend and counselor, a companion to any man who sought him. His interest in the welfare of students was close and personal. Upon matters touching the morals of the institution he often suggested, I am told, subjects for chapel orations to students in order that the studentbody should take a hand in college government. He was greatly interested in the policy of college discipline of the University of Virginia, and hoped to see something of the same spirit in vogue at Bethany.

Prof. Woolery had long expected to enter the practice of law, and it was only the long, loud call of his Alma Mater, which at that time seriously needed his help, which restrained him. Later on he did enter the practice of law, but finding, what many others were aware of long before, that the influence of the Greek spirit was so strong upon him as to render him far better fitted for the quietude and dignity and seclusion of college hal's than for the bustle and assertion of a practical profession, he returned once more to the professor's chair, and served in it until his death.

I very well remember an incident which shows the grace and good sense of the man. Prof. Woolery was always deeply interested in the politics of his state, and was often asked to preside at political gatherings. Once, when Senator Kenna, of West Virginia, was to speak at Wellsburg, Prof. Woorlery was asked to introduce him. There had been some delay about the day's exercises, and the people were growing impatient. Prof. Woolery, perceiving this, tactfully made his introduction brief. He said:

"Fellow-citizens, there was an old Greek poet once who said, 'When the gods speak, let men be silent.' I introduce Senator Kenna."

The little group of college boys present threw up their hats and cheered lustily with pride in their professor and appreciation of his literary reference, while many of the crowd turned around to look and wondered what the Bethany man meant!

Prof. Woolery was thus always in good taste in all his public utterances. No college audience, in chapel, in literary society, in excited gathering of some one of Bethany's many exciting times, ever found "Cass" Woolery at fault. He was always ready, always forceful, always calm and judicious.

Once, when certain college boys had been arrested in a very violent and insulting marner by the town authorities, Prof. "Cass" undertook their defence. He insisted upon their immediate trial and acted as their counsel. By his knowledge of law he so confused and confounded the simple villagers who had made the arrest that the students wer allowed to go free, to the immense chagrin of the captors, and the kindly triumph of the Professor. No more fitting word, perhaps, could be said of him than "The Student's Friend."

"TO PLAINNESS HONOR'S BOUND."

BAXTER WATERS.

I have just read an article in the Outlook entitled, "A Matter of Conscience." It suggests as the most important quality of a college president, "the ability to bear and to give pain." The writer continues thus: "There is nothing more painful than to refuse to aid a thoroughly conscientious man who is trying to do something for which he is not fitted." He speaks of a class of men and women, hard-working and self-sacrificing, "but without fitness for the tasks they set themselves to do. They claim encouragement and indorsement, and one would be delighted to give the fullest possible indorsement to their character, their spirit and their willingness to work; but if one has any conscience he has no right to indorse the enterprise they have in hand," etc. This is the gist of the argument. The The ability to give pain so as not to crush or crucify, but to stimulate and arouse to more thorough equipment; not to flatter and pamper men, but to bring them to a sense of need; to appreciate their good points and not to be blind to their faults and imperfections; in a word, to give men a self-estimate that is sane and just. Besides, this alone will shield society and protect it fron frauds and deceivers; it will assign each man to his own place. It will not be unjust to men, but in the highest sense it is not only a just treatment, but merciful to the largest number concerned.

Things are so tangled up and we are so "bound in chains of obligation" that we fear to speak the truth lest we run against self-interest or offend those on whom we depend. Let a new book come out and there are paid reviews in periodicals who "owe courtesy to publishers," etc. Many of these reviews come under a stereotyped form and lack clean-cut lines of discrimination, so that the average reader is at a loss to know what new book to buy. The platform lecturer and church entertainer come along and of course must be "fully indorsed." There is a stale, profitless sameness about letters of commendation.

Many students are kept in colleges who are wholly inapt, and have no capacity for knowledge; and in no department of university life is this truer than in Bible schools and seminaries. Students are encouraged with dishonest flattery; school principals want their money. An honest plainness, to which "honor is always bound," would have advised otherwise. Far be it from me to discourage any young man or take from him the opportunity to try, but the sin is in this wholesale indorsement when the duty lies in the virtue of conscientious candor.

This truth is brought out by Shakespeare in King Lear. The Earl of Kent would rebuke the king. Lear sees that he is preparing for the thrust and exclaims:

The bow is bent and drawn, make from the shaft.

Kent: Let it fall, rather, though the point invade
The region of my heart.

The region of my heart.

When power to flattery bows, then to plainness
Honor's bound,
When majesty falls to folly.

Here Kent bears the pain in a manly way, and uses bold plainness, "when majesty falls o folly."

The spirit of forgiveness and forbearance is both manly and Christian; but simply to overlook wrong-doing, to pass it over in easy indulgence and in a light manner, is neither helpful nor Christian. It is weak and puerile and cowardly. Jesus said: "If thy brother trespass against thee, rebuke him; and if he repent, forgive him." First, the wrong done, then the rebuke or making it known, then repentance and forgiveness. The forgiving is not simply passing over, covering up, or mere forgetting, any more than the rebuking is loudly condemning or harsbly criticising a man; but the idea is to bring a man to a sense of wrong that he may see his sin and turn therefrom, to fasten on him his own unbrotherly, selfish spirit, and then if he faces that like a man and turns to a nobler manhood, the forgiveness will find its own justification. First a revelation of sin and then repentance. Until men stand face to face with their own sinful lives they will never turn from them. It is just this ability to give pain, to tell a man of his breach of friendship and bring him to an honorable sense of duty, that makes us strong and Christlike. Hence a weak, indulgent flatterer cannot forgive, though he smooth it over and forget. Forgiveness requires strength, even sternness, as well as gentleness and tenderness. "To forsive is divine." In Tennyson's "Idyls," after King Arthur had brought the Queen to a deep sense of her own sin so that she felt its awful weight and trembled in penitence, he could utter those sublime words: "I forgive, as eternal God forgives." "To plainness"- as well as forgiveness-"honor's bound." Let not "duty have dread to speak when power to flattery bows." "Cry aloud; spare not." Oftentimes plainness pains "him that gives and him that takes," but like mercy, "it is twice blest;" it blesses

THE GLADSTONE-HUXLEY CONTROVERSY—III.

A. M. HAGGARD.

George Adam Smith has been quoted as saying of Genesis: "Why is it science to Haeckel one minute and error the next?" Let us ask the same question concerning the "underlying theory of the reconcilers:" Why is it *cience to Drummond one minute and error the next? Why are Drummond and Gladstone not agreed if it is science? Why are Drummond and Huxley agreed if it is religion? If Drummond does not agree with Gladstone why does he not agree with Huxley?

Has not Henry Drummond gone into partnership with Prof. Huxley in order to beat Mr. Gladstone? Then, in order to escape going on with his partner to the logical conclusion, that there is nothing of divine revelation in Genesis, first chapter, has he not played false with Gladstone and Huxley, and his own head also? And did it not become a habit with him? How else has he gained the unenviable reputation of misrepresenting scientific facts? A careful and well-informed American writer has recently written a series of articles for a London paper in which he devotes much space to twisted and misstated scientific facts by Mr. Drummond. Judging by the awkward parallels above, this American critic of Mr. Drummond was not wholly without grounds for just criticism.

There is another interesting question: Which one of the partners of the firm, Huxley, Drummond & Co., is right as to the purpose in the mind of the writer of Genesis, first chapter? Both cannot be right. One says: "A scientific theory of the universe formed no part of the writer's intention." The other says: "I suppose it to be an hypothesis respecting the origin of the universe which some ancient thinker found himself able to reconcile with his knowledge or what he thought was knowledge of the nature of things, and therefore assumed to be true." When you have decided which is right and which you will follow, please notice how near together we have brought the disputants at last! Mr. Gladstone, from the first, assumed that there was enough of the scientific element in Genesis to warrant a comparison with science. Prof. Huxley has just now granted that the writer of it meant to make it largely scientific! Prof. Drummond has spoken double on the matter, but does not deny saying: "Genesis can be said to be scientific."

A PAINFUL SURPRISE.

Not far back I spoke of Mr. Huxley as logical and consistent and clear in the position then under discussion. I am sorry to say that he did not maintain that attitude. I fear that my readers will deem him worthy of severer censure than that meted out to Prof. Drummond. I am charitab'e enough to think that Mr. Drummond became entangled in contradictions without the purpose to deceive. I have so far failed to see how to extend the same charity to Prof. Huxley. Every man is not gifted with clear, logical insight. It is here that Drummond is weaker than Huxley, and hence deserves more allowance. In striving to save a pet theory Drummond has gone too far, without meaning to mislead and without knowing that he has played double. But it seems that in fighting for his pet philosophy Mr. Huxley was so hard pressed that he deliberately deceived. The discovery was to me a painful surprise. For some time I refused to believe it. I hope some of my readers will turn to the December number of the Nineteenth Century for 1885 and verify the facts which I here present.

Let it be remembered that the order for which Mr. Gladstone contended was water, air, land. Prof. Huxley rejected this order and dogmatically claimed the order, water, land, air. With one the inhabitants of the air were second in the order of existence and with the other they were third.

About twelve months before this discussion began an insect's wing had been discovered in the geological rocks. It was then the oldest bit of evidence known for the existence of air population. Some two years previous to the discussion scorpions had been found. These were certainly land animals and the oldest then known.

Citing this evidence Prof. Huxley says: "The order plainly suggested 1. Water population; 2. Land and air population." He then adds: "Mr. Gladstone's order can by no means be made to coincide. As a matter of fact, then, the statement so confidently put forward turns out to be devoid of foundation and in direct contradiction of the evidence at present at our disposal"

How cold-blooded and false this is does not appear to the casual reader. Many readers do not know that the wing was discovered in the Middle Silurian and the scorpions in the Upper Silurian, and that therefore the wing is older than the scorpions! This is the very order for which Gladstone contended! With the wing first and the scorpious second, how has Prof. Huxley dared to put the scorpions first and the wing second? He knew that it was not so; why has he said it? Why has he deliberately misrepresented the facts? To answer is one of the most difficult problems I ever undertook. To fit the facts Prof. Huxley should have said: "The order primarily suggested by the existing evidence is Gladstone's order, not mine. His order and his only can be made to coinside with these facts. As a matter of fact, then, my statement, so confidently put forward, turns out to be devoid of foundation and in direct contradiction of the evidence at present found in the Silurian measures!"

This is the man who said in that discussion: "I have taken a great deal of pains to secure that such knowledge as I do possess shall be accurate and trustworthy." Satan's knowledge no doubt is accurate to perfection and perfectly trustworthy also, but his use of it is hellish! In another place he said: "I am not here dealing with a question of speculation, but with a question of fact." Here we learn how he sometimes deals with a question of fact! How often in this controversy has he done the deception act?

The same landscape will look green to one man and red to another, according to the color of the glass each holds before his eyes. Having discovered the color used by Mr. Huxley, no one will be surprised at the appearance of the Hebrew words of Genesis as seen by Prof. Huxley. He says: "If the word in the original Hebrew translated foul should really, after all, mean cockroach—I have great faith in the elasticity of that tongue in the hands of biblical exegetes." It is a bad thing for a pickpocket to cry "stop thief!" and a far worse thing for grave scientists to adopt the same tactics.

I am sorry to know that the Huxleyan method with facts is not wholly confined to the skeptical critics. I frequently find believing critics of large piety working by it! The most recent instance involves H. E. Ryle, of Queen's College, and James Hastings, author of "A Dictionary of the Bible," a large work, two volumes of which are recently out. In Vol. I., p. 602, Col. 2, (a) Prof. Ryle endorses Prof. Hastings on p. 285, Col. I, third article. This article is devoted to the Hebrew word EBER. With one fact forgotten or hidden away from view this word furnishes an argument for the late date of the Book of Dueteronomy. With all the facts brought out this word does not furnish such argument. Prof. Hastings leaves out that one fact! And Prof. Ryle uses the baseless argument! I do not object to any one proving that Deuteronomy was written a thousand years after Moses, but I do object to the Huxleyan method with facts in doing it. So that my readers may have a chance to look more at length into this matter, I quote the misleading sentence: "Wherever Moses is introduced as the speaker it (EBER) refers to the west." This is not true. as may be seen by reference to Deut. 3:8.

One of the most pronounced samples of this method with facts was exhibited in the Harvard Summer School of Theology, 1899. A man of mature thought, a scholar made in American universities and finished in German schools, a professor of O. T. literature and of the Hebrew language, was the guilty party! As an evidence of the unhistoric nature of the Genesis record he cited the expedition of Abraham in the rescue of Lot. (Gen. 14). Since I cannot put it on paper you must imagine the incredulity and the contemptuous sneer with which he asked: "Four kings just victorious over five kings and then overcome by a shepherd with 318 slaves?" I thought of Majuba Hill. But I wondered more that he covered up part of the facts from his hearers. He surely knew Abraham had three strong confederates. Certainly, he knew that these confederates were with him. He could not have been ignorant that it was a battle of four military leaders with other four. pleases has a right to prove that Genesis is a myth, but has any one a right to murder the facts in order to enthrone his philosophy?

THE NEW EVANGELISM.

J. M. LOWE.

Nothing is new, yet everything is always new. "Each morn is a world made new." Truth does not grow, but the world's conception of it grows. "New occasions teach new duties." In a pre-eminent sense our age is new. It is theological, of course, but more ethical; speculative, but more practical; superstitious, but more sensible. There is a new adjustment of things in progress. A hundred things conspire to hurry us forward into a new era. With many voices the world is calling the church into new realms of activity. Yet it is all one movement There is no isolation. The terms social, political, religious, are terms only-imaginary boundary lines. Whatever life is, it is the same in all—pure in one, pure in all; corrupt in one, corrupt in all. One motive must dominate the whole. He who has one in religion and another in politics is divided against himself and cannot stand.

In this new adjustment, everywhere evident, this new search for fundamentals, evangelism cannot escape. She must face about and recognize her guest and friend. She must reckon with this new ally.

To be specific: 1. Christendom is learning, rather unlearning, many things about entering into the kingdom. It is no longer thought that it gives a man convulsions to enter the kingdom of God, nor is this entrance a process of agony and groans. A man may enter a church clothed and in his right mind and not excite any suspicion as to the genuineness of his conversion. What part the Disciples of Christ have had in this transformation no one knows.

- 2. Christendom has learned that the Holy Spirit can "operate" without instructions from men. It is perhaps also known, or ought to be, that the Holy Spirit is here and has been for centuries, accomplishing all that the stubborn heart of man will permit. He does not need to be besought and implored to do what he came especially to perform as fast as the opportunity comes.
- 3. There is a change of base as to authority. There is no authority but truth. We cannot accept the dicta of men, however venerable and wise they may be, unless their utterances strike us as being true. The Bible stands and shall stand, not because a king or a pope or a council has decreed that it shall, but by its own inherent right and might. No man will ever dislodge the axioms of mathematics. So in the shining circle of truth which cannot be broken, the words of Jesus must remain the brightest gems forever. The pendulum of authority has swung from an infallible church to an infallible book. It is now nearing the centerthe infallible Christ. The preeminent prophecy of the Bible to the human heart is, "Ye shall know the truth." The evangelism of to-day must be not less scriptural, but more rational; not less religious, but more scientific.
- 4. The message of the pulpit to the pew must be pronounced, not in tones of harsh authority, but in the passion of love, calm in the consciousness of truth. True, men must obey the law of God as set forth in the gospel, but it must not be forgotten that this law is born of love. The hearer should be made to feel that the law proclaimed from the pulpit is written in his own heart if he will but be brave and wise enough to read it there.
- 5. The evangelist of the Church of Christ may and should esteem it his privilege to place under tribute to his plea all the good points of the denominations. He surely must be modest enough to admit at the outset that perhaps other people may know some things which it is quite worth his while to learn. Let his preaching be constructive, admitting candidly the truth of many things and then show their larger and fuller unity in his own plea. Brethren, we proclaim to the world, far and wide, that God's people should be one. Who are God's people? Should not then the result of our meetings in a community be to bring the churches nearer together in the highest, happiest harmony, not by withholding the truth, but by telling it, all of it, in love which is the spirit of truth, which is the spirit of God?

Finally, the New Evanagelism declares that Christianity is not a road to follow, but a life to live—a large, lofty, luminous life—with its own birth and growth; its own inspirations and aspirations, its own glory and crown; a life which sweeps past the good in pursuit of the best; a life whose eye sees even now the gleaming spires of the City of God tipped with the gold of morning.

Des Moines, Ia.

Ministerial Association, Eastern Ohio.

The thirty-seventh annual meeting of this wellknown association was held at Canton, Ohio, on Sept. 4-6. It is said to be the oldest organization of its kind among our people. F. M. Green has been secretary for twenty five years. Lathrop Cooley, who has been preaching for fifty-nine years, was present and delivered an address. Harrison Jones, who has been preaching for seventy-two years, was present and sang a song and made several speeches that were highly appreciated. Bro. Jones' life as a preacher extends back to the time when distinct or separate churches were just organized among the Disciples of Christ. This is the country known as the Western Reserve and it is here where Walter Scott first baptized men on the confession of faith in Christ. This is historic ground, and here are men who still linger with us and who began their work as ministers with the beginning of this Reformation. It is a great plessure to associate with these grand old men and hear them speak of pioneer days and the triumphs of the gospel at their hands.

The program of the association was a good one. Several of the addresses had been delivered before we arrived, but all spoke of them in the highest praise. Those we heard were on living, practical subjects, which were well handled. The principal addresses were delivered by Alanson Wilcox, P. H. Welshimer, Alomons Baker, A. M. Chamberlain, M. L. Streator, L. G. Bateman and the writer. All were voted worthy of publication. Thus a much larger audience will be reached.

- C. A. Hill, pastor, and his good wife, together with the Canton Church, did all they could to care for the delegates. The fellowship and enjoyment seemed perfect. We missed R. Moffett from the association on account of illness. Others were absent for various causes. Those present seemed delighted with the turn of matters. Would say before it slips my mind that this is the home of President McKinley. He did not attend any of the sessions of the association, as he seemed to have business in Washington.
- F. M. Green makes a good presiding officer. He seems to know everything about everybody in these parts.
- L. G. Bateman is doing a good work for the church at Mansfield. He is one of our most active and capable men in Northern Ohio.
- M. L. Streator told about the Book of Daniel. He thinks he has found the ten lost tribes of Israel and is to give us the benefit of his researches in a book.
- L. W. Spayd has written a book on the Two Covenants and the Sabbath. It is an excellent presentation of this living question. He is pastor at G ieve, Ohio.
- W. T. Sellers represented the literature of the Christian Publishing Company. His smiles and willingness to serve captivates every one. He has recently moved from Akron to Cincinnati and located his office in Lincoln Inn Court, where he may be addressed and will be glad to see his friends.

 G. A. HOFFMANN.

Alexander Campbell's Theology, by W. E. Garrison, the most recent book issued by the Christian Publishing Company, is already receiving high commendation from many of our leading men and best thinkers. It is a handsome volume of 302 pages, worthy in every respect a place in the library of every preacher and thinking Disciple. Price, $1.00. Christian Pub. Co., St. Louis.

Our Budget.

- -All Missouri Disciples aboard for Moberly.
- —Missouri Christian Missionary Convention, Moberly, Sept. 17 20.
- —Help the victims of the West Indies huricane in Galveston and other Texas coast towns.
- —Hear the cry of India's starving millions and divide with them your abundance.
- —These demands upon our sympathies and assistance serve to emphasize the unity of the race and the brotherhood of man.
- -Now that the summer fitters are returning home, there should be a renewal of activity along all lines of church work.
- —Sometimes a member receives, during his summer vacation, a religious impetus which he failed to receive at home. We met a brother, a few days since, who attended a prayer-meeting while away that gave him renewed zeal in the Master's cause.
- —The extreme heat of the month of August seems to have had a bad effect upon the morals of the country in the notable increase of crime. At one time there was almost an epidemic of murders, suicides and divorce proceedings. On the 19th and 20th days of the month seventeen murders were reported in one St. Louis paper and all of them of the most unlooked-for character. They were mostly the outcome of family feuds. In most cases liquor played its part, as usual, but these causes seem to have been aggravated by the intense heat during the entire month.
- -On last Sunday the assistant editor of this paper visited the church at Festus in this state. This congregation has recently suffered greatly by removals, but the brethren are still keeping house for the Lord and pressing on in the work. The writer also visited the church at Hematite, Mo., where we have a house and a few brethren, but no regular preaching. Here, too, the Sunday school and Endeavor Societies and public worship on the Lord's day are maintained despite the absence of a pastor. We have a good house at each of the places named and some excellent brethren, and it is to be hoped that some evangelist or suitable preacher may be found who can come and enlarge their numerical and financial strength. The writer will visit them for awhile.
- —The minutes of the Tidewater Convention, held at Rappahannock, Va., Aug. 7-9, show that more than double the amount of money raised in any year since 1895 has been raised this year and two new churches have been organized. Last year there were seven churches preacherless; this year but two. There are also many other signs of growth and prosperity in the district.
- -The church in Tuxedo, Mo., D. N. Gillett, pastor, has been giving a series of entertainments and lectures by which they are decreasing their church debt. Among the lectures was one on Mexico by A. B. Payne, of the Keystone View Co., of this city. In this lecture about seventy views taken in Mexico by Bro. Payne were shown upon the screen by a lantern. The views were fine and gave the audience a vivid conception of the wonders, beauties and curiosities of that strange land. By request the lecture was repeated. Another interesting lecture was given by M.-L. Sornborger, pastor of the Carondelet Christian Church. The chief attraction in this lecture was Bro. Sornborger's rapid free hand drawing of human faces illustrative of character. We have never seen one better in this art, and while some of his faces are comical they nevertheless teach a lesson. The next is to be an illustrated lecture on China by our city evangelist, A. J. Marshall.

- —The exercises for Boys' and Girls' Rally Day for America, prepared by Chas. M. Fillmore with music by the Fillmore Bros, will be sent free to any one asking for it. Address Benj. L. Smith, Y. M. C. A. Bldg., Cincinnati, Ohio.
- —One of the most unique things we have yet seen in literature is the publication in tract form of the Lord's Prayer in the sign language of the deaf. A girl is pictured in all of the movements required by the prayer in that larguage. This booklet is the work of Prof. Abel S. Clark, of the American School for the Deaf, Hartford, Conn. Price, 15 cents. The Conneticut Magazine Co., Hartford, Conn., publishers.
- —The amouncement of the Institute of St. John for the coming season shows the author, J. S. Hughes, has enlarged his field. "The later days of early Christianity and John's place in the Christian economy, the light of his Revelation and the coming glory," etc. For rich entertainment and spiritual uplift no church need look further for a week of feasting. Address E. B. Scofield, 15 Vag. Ave., Indianapolis, Ind.
- —We desire to call special attention to the articles in our Family Circle this week, especially to the call from Bro. Martin for a Christian Home at Hot Springs, Ark. This is a matter worthy of the attention of the brotherhood.
- —The American Boy is the name of a comparatively new journal, published monthly, by the Sprague Publishing Co., Detroit, Mich., at $1 per year. It is a finely illustrated, high-grade journal, ntertaining alike to both old and young.
- —It is said that many Eskimos have lost their lives from whiskey brought to them by whalers. They become drunk and are then frozen to death. There seems to be no consequences from which the liquor traffic shrinks.
- -In an article on Practical Education by J. Fraise Richard, recently, in the Fayette Record, Fayette, Ohio, he says: "Much of the education of the times does not educate. It is a study of mere words without a grasp of the principles that underlie the subject. It seems to be completely divorced from all practical use in this life." not a similar complaint be made against presentday Christianity? Much of the Christianity of the times doee not Christianize. It is a profession of mere forms without a grasp of the principles that underlie the subject. Christianity seems to be completely divorced from all practical spheres of life. This is unfortunate and what the man of the world most needs to-day is the man who can teach the people where and how to apply it in the affairs
- -The Christian preachers of St. Louis resumed their Monday morning meetings in this office on last Monday. All of the preachers but Bro. Hamann and Bro. Fannon and Bro. Waters were present. Bro. Hamann has not yet returned from his vacation. There were present also Bro. J. D. Dillard, agent for the Christian Orphans' Home f r Missouri; Bro. B. L. Smith, of Cincinnati, our Home Missions secretary; D. R. Dungan, president of Christian University, Canton, Mo., and G. A. Hoffmann, field agent of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST. In the reports it was stated that Compton Heights Church of this city and the First Church of East St. Louis had each reduced their indebtedness $1,600, and the Second Church of this city $1,200. Some other churches reported the payment of smaller debts. The Fourth Church of this city has decided to build a new and larger house. Officers for the new year were elected and a program committee appointed to provide for something profitable at each meeting. The outlook of the churches is encouraging. The new campaign promises to be very fruitful of good things for the Master.

- —The Broadway Church, of Lexington, Ky. have made a forward movement by employing as helper to the church Miss Virginia Hearne, who spent three months last spring in the Central Church, Cincinnati, preparing for this work under the direction of Bro. A. M. Harvuot, the pastor She is an intelligent and consecrated young woman and we believe will prove a great help to the courch.
- -M. M. Davis, of Dallas, Texas, has been chosen by the stockholders of the Christian Courier Publishing Company to succeed W. K. Homan, as its editor. The resignation of Bro. Homan, of which mention has been made in these columns, takes away from the Courier a strong man, but the stockholders seem to have been very fortunate in the selection of a man to succeed him. Bro. Davis is well known in the brotherhood as an able writer, and having identified him self with the brethren in Texas will give them a vigorous, helpful journal. We wish Bro. Homan success in his return to his legal work and Bro. Davis and the Courier success in their great and arduous task. The Christian brotherhood need the Christian Courier, especially in the great Southwest.
- —Mr. and Mrs. Joseph I. Irwin, of Columbus, Indiana, were to have celebrated the golden anniversary of their marriage at their home on August 15th, notice of which had been prepared for the papers, when the sad accident of the drowning of their grandson, Joseph Irwin Sweeney, changed their plans, and prevented the celebration. The Evening Republican, of Columbus referring to this fact, says:

Mr. Irwin, we are assured, had planned generously for the deceased. His father had great reason to build high hopes for his future. He was endowed by nature with a brilliant and acute mind. His personality was pleasing and attractive. His acquired knowledge was not often surpassed by a person of his age. He was a leader in everything in which he was engaged. He was completing his literary education with everything pointing to a successful and brilliant future.

While expressing sympathy with these grandparents in their bereavement, their friends also tender congratulations on their having reached and passed the golden anniversary of their marriage, and wish for them many years yet of happy wedded life.

-The full results of the work done all over this country and Canada on the first day named for Bible Study Sunday, September 9th, cannot be estimated until the possible classes are all formed. A little geographical and denominational study of the statistics of the six hundred churches observing the day is interesting and suggests the extent of the influence in behalf of better Bible study thus set in motion. These statistics are as follows: By donominations, Baptist, 135; Congregational, 110; Presbyterian, 85; Meth dist Episcopal, 80; Christian, 23; Lutheran and Reformed, 16; Cumberland Presbyterian, 11: Church of Christ, 5; United Presbyterian, 4; Protestant Episcopal, 4; Unitarian, 3; United Evangelical, 3; Mennonite, 3; Adventist, 2; Friends, 2; Trinity Evangelical, 1; Brethren, 1 Universalist, 1; African M. E., 1; Union Mission. 1; not designated, 109. Geographically, New England, 99; Middle States, 143; Middle West, 206; South, 32; Far West, 64; Canada, 58; Foreign Countries, 3. It should be remembered that there are yet three more Sundays in September and even the first Sunday in October would not be too late to present the subject. Suggested outlines for sermons, special services and schemes for working up classes can still be obtained by addressing the American Institute of Sacred Literature (Hyde Park, Chicago, Ill.), the organization with whom the plan originated.

Chas. E. Dunlap, of Nashville, Mo., expects to be in the evangelistic field for awhile.

O. M. Olds has accepted a call from the church at Sheldon, Iowa, which place will be his future

The pastor of the church at Hannibal, Mo., with his family, has returned from his month's vacation pleasantly spent in New York and Ohio.

V. E. Redenour, of Ft. Scott, Kan., will soon be able to be at work again. For fall and winter work address him at Ft. Scott.

Bro. R. E. McKnight, of Sumner, Wash, has returned from a very delightful outing on Puget Sound, much improved in health.

- H. M. Barnett, of Sheldon, Ill., has closed his four years of labor with the church at Sheldon and accepted a call to Rantoul, Ill.
- L. F. McCray, formerly pastor at Chillicothe, Mo., has resigned the work there in order to enter the evangelistic field. Present address, 1322 Twenty-fourth St., Des Moines, Ia.
- S. F. Rogers, Illiopolis, Ill., will close his seven-year pastorate at that place on the third Lord's day in December. Will be ready for work at some place after that time.

Roland A. Nichols has been conducting open-air services in Lincoln Park, near Niagara Falls, in which he was assisted by Bro. Bellingham, who conducted the singing.

G. F. Assiter can take an appointment for one protracted meeting in October or late in September, and one in December. Address him at Troy, Elder N. E. Cory will close his work at Barry, Ill., Sept 9th. A fine house has been built there the last year and the congregation strengthened. Some congregation should secure him at once. He is in every way adapted for the work.

O. F. Jordan, who has been serving the breth-ren at Fisher, Ill, the past year and who recently received a call for the coming year has been called to the church at Rockford, Ill. He has ac-cepted the latter field of labor and will enter on his new duties Sept. 16.

Guy B. Williamson, singing evangelist, has writton a neat little tract of twenty four pages on "Soggestions in Soul winning." We have read the tract and do not hesitate to commend it to the workers of the Lord's vineyard. The suggestions are wise, practical and good. It is deeply spiritual throughout.

In speaking of the work of Bro. Kreidler in North Tonawanda their local church paper, Upward, says: "Bro. C. M. Kreidler closed his work at North Tonawanda last Sunday. Judging from results, it was certainly a saccessful pastorate. There were over 90 additions to the church in 10 months at the regular services, no revival being held during that time. The C. W. B. M has grown from 35 to 140, and all departments of the work are in good condition."

F. A. Bright, pastor of the church in Painesville, O., is highly esteemed for his work's sake. Of him the local paper says: "As a preacher Mr. Bright is clear, vigorous, and earnest. Sandy Lake, Carpenter's Corners and Milledgeville united in giving him a call to become their pastor im mediately upon his graduation from Hiram College in 1892, which position he filled for three years, when he accepted one of the numerous calls he was continually receiving from city churches. Though but a boy when he accepted the work here, more than 100 were added to the church in the first eight months of his pastorate here."

Christian-Evangelist Special to Moberly.

All aboard! CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST special to state convention. Moberly, September 17. Going to the best convention town in the state. Going to the largest convention held by any single religious body in the state. Going to hear the convention sermon, by J. H. Garrison, of St. Louis, on "A Century's Triumph." Going to enjoy the fellowship and join heart and hand with Christian people in carrying on the Lord's work in the greatest state in the Union. Going to be entertained by people of whom we can say there no better. All right. Thank you for the invitation This special is a good and thoughtful euterprise; and, by the way, you will be joined by a goodly number of Mexicans. A MEXICAN.

Dr. E. S. Ames.

Edward Scribner Ames, A. M., Ph. D., whose picture will be found on our first page, was born "since the war" at Eau Claire, Wisconsin. He is the son of Lucius B. Ames, minister, of Des Moines, Iowa, who belongs to the Massachusetts Ames family. His mother is a Scribner of New York. Prof. Ames graduated at Drake with degree of A. B., in the class of '89, receiving the degree of A. M. in '91. He took the Divinity course in Yale, receiving the degree of B. D. in 1892. He was a graduate student in Philosophy at Yale from '92-'94. He had a fellowship in Philosophy at the University of Chicago, where he received the degree of Ph. D. in 1895. He was instructor in the Disciples' Divinity House there, and docent in Philosophy in the university until 1897. He then accepted the professorship of Philosophy and Pedagogy in Butler College, where he served from 1897 to the present year. He served a short pastorate at Perry, Iowa, in 1890, and has acted as supply for a few months in the following churches: Central Church, Des Moines; South Broadway Church, Denver; Sterling Place Church, Brooklyn; 56th Street Church, New York, and Evanston, Illinois. He has written a number of articles for our magazine and newspaper literature, and has a valuable paper on "The Value of Theology" in the book entitled "Our First Congress." Professor Ames has recently accepted the pastorate of the Hyde Park Church, Chicago, Illinois, and a position in the University of Chicago, in connection with the Department of Philosophy. This field of labor Is well adapted to his tastes and spe ial training, and promises enlarged usefulness for him. He is a fine scholar, a preacher of acknowledged power, a successful teacher and a writer of orignality and force. We wish him the largest success and usefulness in his new field of Georgia's Jubilee Convention.

The Georgia convention, meeting this year in Augusta, November 20-23, promises to be of unusual interest. It will round up the first fifty years of our organization for evangelistic work, and we hope to make it a glad and triumphant jubilee occasion. The churches in Augusta expect and desire a very large concourse, and they will be fully prepared to welcome and entertain all that may come. Bro. A. B. Phillips has remodeled and greatly beautified the First Christian Church-in which the convention will be held-and the hearts of all the good sisters are fully set in them to have everything comme it faut. The people are coming from the mountains and the seaboard, from the river to the end of the state, and we expect a large contingent from South Carolina and some good-looking people from Florida and Alabama.

You must come. Our splendid new preachers will be in evidence, and, of course, the old reliables. We expect distinguished men from abroad. There will be the best of singing and good, warm praying. And then our Georgia women will be on hand and they beat the world. Just think of it—they are running two societies, and each one twice as big as both would be together! They have learned how to work their sum in division and get their answer in multiplication. They are exactly alike, but very different. They are seperated, but perfectly joined together. Both societies are missionary to the backbone; and whichever prays, the other says, Amen! They love one another and cooperate heartily. The explanation of the mystery is about this: One of these societies is set for preaching the gospel to all the world-and to Georgia; the other is for preaching the gospel to Georgia-and to all the world. The distinction will seem very plain and of great practical importance -if you see it. If you don't, you must come to the convention and find out about it, for I tell you our blessed women see it, and see it clearly.

Yes, we expect to have the biggest, the most interesting and most edifying and encouraging convention in our whole history. You cannot afford to miss it. Come.

J. S. LAMAR.

Moberly, Sept. 17-20.

The Missouri State Convention of the Christian Church assembles at the place and on the date given above. The gathering should surpass in numbers and interest all that have gone before. There is a danger that we may neglect our state convention because the National Convention will be held in Kansas City in the month following. To do this would be a grievous error. Missouri should be strong enough and interested enough to take care of the latter without injury to the former. Our responsibilities are not lessened because we are to have our brethren from all parts of our great nation meet within our borders, but rather, it becomes us the more to set an example of earnestness and devotion that will strengthen the opinion of the brotherhood everywhere that the Disciples of Missouri are indeed strong.

We are especially desirous of securing a large attendance from St. Louis and the adjoining parts of the state. The Christian-Evangelist, in order that the trip may be made in pleasant and congenial company, has arranged for a special coach (provided a sufficient number go from St. Louis to Moberly) exclusively for those attending the convention.

This coach will be attached to the Kansas City Express, leaving St. Louis at 9 A. M. and arriving at Moberly at 1:25 P. M., Monday, Sept. 17. If you can join us at St. Louis or at any point en route, we would be glad to have you do so.

But please let us know at once in order that sufficient accommodations may be provided and erowding avoided. Address W. D. CREE, care of this office.

A Visit to the Office of the Church Extension Board.

It was my privilege to be present a few days ago when this board held its regular monthly meeting in its office, Kansas City, Mo.

As almost every one knows, this board is composed of some of the most capable business men and preachers in the entire brotherhood, and this is one of the wise features of this work, for these men have under their direction almost $250,000 of money entrusted to them by their brethren, to be used in the best possible manner in aiding the weak and struggling churches in building houses of worship.

This fund is constantly growing, and so wisely has it been managed that not one dollar has been lost or misplaced. I heard the report of the secretary, Bro. Muckley, who was not present, and that of the treasurer, Bro. Bryan. These showed that Church Extension is growing with our people.

Two very vivid impressions of that meeting remain with me. 1. The painstaking care with which they examined all applications for loans, and 2. The fairness and impartiality shown in dealing with all who applied.

On the one hand they were very careful with the funds intrusted to them; on the other they were exceedingly anxious to do the very best possible by their brethren applying for aid. What a great blessing to the brotherhood this fund is! I hope this month will witness one of the largest offerings in our history for this good cause. Let every church give something. Already the offerings are coming in. During all of September there should be a constant stream of money flowing into the treasury.

The Now of Ministerial Relief.

BRETHREN OF THE CHUCH OF CHRIST:-Septen ber 30th the books will close, with the record the fifth year of this excellent ministry. There are now but a few days left during which you ma send in your gifts of love, and be enrolled as con tributor to this holy cause. Now is the time you assistance is needed. The October quarterly di tributions are upon us and you have not provide us with funds nearly sufficient to meet this d mand. If you have out an unpaid pledge to th work now is the time to meet that obligation. you have not made a pledge, but have had it in you heart to lend some aid to our worthy needy, no is the time to do that thing. If your church he not made its offering to this cause this year, no is the time to speak to your pastor about the ma ter and see that an opportunity is given the church to do that which with a word of encouragement would most gladly do.

It was the desire of Bro. Atkinson, in whose heart God put the plan of this noble work, the every preacher in the brotherhood should annual contribute $2 as an expression of appreciation of the work of these pioneer worthles. Brethre of the ministry, only a few days of the preser year remain. If you have not thus expressed you self, now is the time, a very acceptable and o portune time. The money is needed. It is neede now. Let us heer from you. Send to Howai Cale, 120 East Market St., Indianapolis.

Rosy Teachers

LOOK BETTER IN THE SCHOOLROOM THAN THE SA LOW SORT.

Young folks naturally like comely objects, as a good-looking, healthy teacher can do vastly most with pupils, everything else considered, than the skinny, dyspeptic teacher can. The instructor Latin and mathematics in a young ladies' seminas at Macon, Ga., had an experience worthy the attention of any teacher.

She kept running down a little more each yeu until finally a genuine case of nervous prostrations set in and she was confined to her bed for eigmonths, a perfect wreck, physically and mentall She and her friends thought it was due to overwork, but she now knows it was due to improp food.

Of course, the physicians were called in, b there is almost nothing that can be done in succases, except to rely on well-selected food a proper care. She was put upon Grape Nuts, a medicines, also tea, coffee, and iced drinks we taken away. She had Postum Food Coffee once day. The larger part of her food was Grape-Nut for this food is made with special reference to r building the gray matter in the brain and ner centres.

The lady says: "I had been reduced to pounds in weight when I began using Grape-Nu. The new food was so delicious and strengthenithat I felt new life at once. I have now develoed into a perfectly healthy, happy, stout woms weighing 135 pounds, the greatest weight I evattained, and have a wonderfully clear, fresh, rocomplexion, instead of the sallow, bilious hue the past.

have attended several camp meetings on this st, but I have never attended one where I ard better preaching. The unity and harmony t prevailed throughout and the warm, heartt prayers and exhortations showed to all presthat the Holy Spirit dominated our minds and rts. I never saw a happier people and I never t happier myself. That we all enjoyed a time refreshing from the presence of God no one doubt.

The songs-all led by Bro. John Gilliam, Esther ds being the organist-were soul-inspiring and calculated to lead us nearer to the cross of rist. Our evangelist reported as the result of months' work, assisted by Bro. and Sister Webb the service of song, 133 additions and the orhization of two new congregations-one at mington and the other at Silver Creek in the ntry. These two young churches have enred the services of Bro. W. L. McIlvaine, and I I sure the cause of the Lord under his labors prosper, for he is a man of God.

Endeavorers Attention Wanted.

FELLOW-ENDEAVORERS: - Since the state convention at California and the beginning of the new year, but one society in the state has forwarded a contribution for this work. We only ask a small amount, $1 from each society. If all will give even this much we shall be able to prosecute this work. But if it is neglected nothing can be done. This year we shall bend our energies upon the organization of new societies. This requires money. Not much, of course, but enough to meet actua expenses. Will not the societies over the state, in tens and twenties respond without delay? Do not wait, do not postpone, but remit at once. One more word. The program of the committee of our state convention has given Christian Endeavor the hour from seven to eight o'clock of Thursday evening September 20. The hour will be used in a "Model Endeavor Prayer-meeting," using the topic for the Sunday following. This will be of interest to all Endeavor workers, as will be the entire convention program. Let the Endeavor hosts not fail to come in large numbers. The railroads over the state have made good rates, and all can afford the time and money. It will be a great meeting, and do you good. But don't forget to send in that CLAUD E. HILL, $1 for your society.

Nebraska Notes.

While on a little visiting tour recently I stopped at Blue Springs to visit with our faithful coworker, Bro. L. A. Hussong, and quite naturally we reached there just at that time of the day when the wants of the physical man are to be supplied, and we were most agreeably surprised to find a large table sumptuously spread with all the necessaries and luxuries, to which we were invited to partake. The tables were supplied from the baskets of many of the members of the church at Wymore and Blue Springs, which assembly of members, and well-filled baskets were likewise a surprise to Bro. and Sister Hussong. We spent a very pleasant time with Bro. Hussong and members stopping with them until the next day, when we left on the P. M. train for Burchard, where we were employed as pastor last year. Upon invitation from the church we preached for them morning and evening, returning home Monday.

By invitation of the church at Enid, Okla.. Bro. L. P. Builta, of Burchard, preached there Sunday, August 19. We would be very glad to supply their pulpit permanently from Nebraska's product but at present we need them all at home. While in Oklahoma he visited old friends and relatives in different parts, returning in time for his per manent work at DuBois last Sunday.

The church at Liberty have employed Bro. Green for half time rather than one fourth time as they have had since last spring.

The church at Tecumseh is very prosperous under the guiding hand of Bro. Zink, and new members are added almost every Lord's day.

Bro. E. G. Reese has resigned his work at Bethany Church (Mayberry) and will move to Bethany, where he will enter school at Cotner for the next EDWARD CLUTTER. year.

Thousands Have Kidney Trouble and Don't Know it

How To Find Out.

Fill a bottle or common glass with your water and let it stand twenty-four hours; a sediment or settling indicates an unhealthy condi-tion of the kidneys; if it stains your linen it is evidence of kidney trouble; too frequent desire to pass it or pain in the back is also convincing proof that the kidneys and bladder are out of order.

What to Do.

There is comfort in the knowledge so often expressed, that Dr. Kilmer's Swamp-Root, the great kidney remedy fulfills every wish in curing rheumatism, pain in the back, kidneys, liver, bladder and every part of the window persons. of the urinary passage. It corrects inability to hold water and scalding pain in passing it, or bad effects following use of liquor, wine or beer, and overcomes that unpleasant necessity of being compelled to go often during the day, and to get up many times during the night. Christian Workers' Convention.

The Christian Workers' Conference at Northfield this year was by far the most successful ever held. The object of the National Convention which convenes September 19-26, is to do for the West what the Northfield Conference has done for the East and South.

The first hour of each day will be devoted to united prayer for God's blessing on all churches and Christian Workers. Requests for prayer are invited from all pastors, teachers or Christians of any name who are burdened for their churches or friends. These requests will be read and remembered before God. It is hoped also that those who send requests will unite with us in prayer from nine to ten o'clock each day.

Leading Bible expositors like Drs. Gray, Torrey, Newell and Patterson will open the Word and show how to promote an interest in Bible study in any church or community.

This convention will also be a clearing house for the exchange of ideas and methods in Christian work. Men and women who have been signally successful in different lines of soul-winning work will tell how they do it, and answer questions as to their methods and results.

The meetings will be held at the Moody Bible Institute and the Chicago Avenue Church. The usual rate of one and one-third fare for the round trip on certificate plan has been granted by the Western, Central and Southwestern Passenger Associations. For further particulars as to railroad rates and board, application should be made to Rev. H. W. Pope, secretary, 80 Institute Place, Chicago, Ill.

The Lands of the Long Day-X.

THE HOME OF THE CZARS.

Russia, like Rhode Island, is blessed with two capitals. Everybody knows how Peter the Great, inheriting a throne at Moscow, was galled by the isolation of that capital and built St. Petersburg that he might have a "window looking out upon Europe." This done, it became necessary to extend the frontier in that direction, for no selfrespecting monarch could endure to see a foreign flag flying almost under his palace windows. The boundary of Finland is less than thirty miles from St. Petersburg; so much the worse for Finland. The Baltic States are almost as close on the south side of the Gulf of Finland; so much the worse for the Baltic States. Both must be Russified, for Peter's desire for a "window looking out upon Europe" did not prevent him from wishing to have a broad Russian dooryard in front of that window. From that day to this the case of Russia and her neighbors (especially her weaker neighbors) has been that of a man who wishes simultaneously to see beyond his own fence and to extend his fence to include everything which he can see.

It comes to me now rather tardily that, after labeling Finland as "The Land of the Thousand Lakes," I omitted to make further mention of the lakes. The fact is that, although the country is as full of lakes as a sieve is of holes, they played a very small part in my trip. One can go by steamer through chains of lakes, rivers and canals into the very heart of Finland by several different routes. Probably this, combined with a liberal use of carts and horses, is the best means of seeing Fin'and-rut not for one who has to go from the Arctic Circle to Naples in less than a month, stopping to visit four capitals on the way. I had intended to stop between Helsingfors and St. Petersburg and make a detour to visit the famous cataract of Imatra, the outlet of a great system of lakes, but I was not caring much about waterfalls that day and tossed a coin to help me to decide. The coin said go to Imatra; so I went the other way, to St. Petersburg. I was not going to be bullied by a copper ten-penni piece.

Of all the spots in the Russian Empire few offered a more unpromising site for a city, when Peter the Great was looking for a place to plant his capital, than that which he finally chose. Nature said: Thou shalt not build a city here. Peter said: I will. The point where the broad Neva finishes its short course from Lake Ladoga to the Gulf of Finland, was a perpetual swamp and subject to periodical inundation. A forest of piles had to be sunk and mountains of masonry placed in position to create a foundation for the city. It was a task like the building of a pyramid, but Peter had the resources of a Pharaoh. He drafted thousands of men into his army and sent them to wage war against the sea, the river and the swamp, in the interest of his "window looking out upon Europe." The conditions of land and sea were against the new capital; the people did not wish to live in it; the court wanted to stay at Moscow, and the church opposed the change. But Peter willed it and it came to pass. The amphibious situation of St. Petersburg is best appreciated when one looks down upon it from the dome of St. Isaac's Cathedral. The scene is as flat as Holland and as watery as the suburbs of Venice. The city is, in fact, like an iceberg: more than half of it is under the surface. In every building that is put up, the making of a solid foundation represents a large part of the total cost.

The first impression produced by St. Petersburg as one rides through its streets is that its architecture is rather too monotonous to be in the highest degree imposing. In no other city are the government buildings so much in evidence, and they are all substattially alike. Long facades of painted stucco, in more or less realistic imitation of stone, stretch in every direction. Even the Winter Palace and the adjoining Hermitage (formerly a palace and now a museum of antiquities and art) present the same monotonous fronts of stucco, one painted an ugly brown and the other an ugly yellow. Both face the Neva and one expects an impressive view of them from the bridge, but their height is so insignificant in comparison with their vast length, the horizontal lines prevail so strongly over the vertical, that the effect is scarcely pleasing.

Perhaps it is only natural that, in a land where the government attempts to absorb or control all the functions of public and private life, the public buildings should occupy all the most conspicuous positions and should determine the architectural tone of the city. It is true, at any rate, not only that the buildings which house Russian officialdom are of amazing extent, but that nearly everything else is built on the same pattern. The business houses are, to be sure, variegated with advertising signs as glaring as any that ever offended the eye in London or New York-and occasionally the patient visitor laboriously spells out some legend only to find, when at length he succeeds in pronouncing it, that it is the familiar name of some American insurance company disguised in Russian letters. But otherwise the same monotonous effect of four-storied stuccoed facades prevails with wearisome persistence. Even the great Nevski Prospect, the handeomest street in the city, owes its effect chiefly to its width, its bustling crowds and (quite as much) to the graceful Admiralty Tower which rises at the end of it. The prevalent brick-andstucco imitation of stone has more justification in St. Petersburg than elsewhere, because stone will not endure the severe frosts and sudden changes of temperature. The Alexander Monument, a granite shaft which claims to be the greatest monolith of modern times, has been cracked from top to bottom by the frost.

Aside from the monotony of the architecture and the width of the streets, the thing which strikes the eye most forcibly is the prevalence of military uniforms. All sorts of people wear them on the slightest excuse, and I suspect that many of the gorgeous uniforms which enliven the boulevards at the fashionable hours are worn by people of most peaceable profession. The army officers themselves, who are naturally numerous in a country whose standing a my is a million strong in time of peace, make a much better appearance than other European officers. I have not seen a better built, better looking or better dressed set of men in Europe, and the long, gray overcoats which they wear in all weathers are as handsome as they must be uncomfortable. The predilection for wearing high-topped boots (with trousers inside) appears to be one of the national weaknesses. Street car conductors wear boots: the members of a uniformed band wear boots: hotel porters wear boots; and a great many people whose occupations defy classification wear boots. The Russian's motto is: In all emergencies wear boots. In war (or peace), wear boots. In rain (or drouth), wear boots. When in doubt, wear

Russian cabmen are more interesting than a good many things in the museums. In fact, all cabmen are interesting, and the observation of the various types of the mercenary Jehu in various lands is always worth while. It must be borne in mind, too, that in most European cities the absence of up-to-date rapid transit facilities and the cheapness of cab fares bring this trib into a prominence unknown in any American city The St. Petersburg cabman is gotten up in ground-sweeping blue dressing gown, which suc gests that he had habited himself in haste. It is not even buttoned, but is wrapped once and a hal around him and secured with a girdle of man colors, which rivals Joseph's coat in its polychron brilliancy. The hat is a very low felt "plug" wit an exaggerated bell crown. Perhaps it is the hat more than anything else which makes a many of them look like Jews. Upon the driver the ordinary hackney cab (a diminutive victoria the blue dressing gown hangs in loose and flab! folds, with a general air of dejection and flat lency. But one who sits upon the box of a mor pretentious vehicle is padded as to the hips at back with many wrappings of blanket, over which the gown fits without a wrinkle. The perimet of the coachmen varies directly with the prete tiousness of the equipage, and the driver of really fashionable outfit, though he may exhibit Cassian leanness and hungriness of visage, ca assume a padded rotundity which makes it almo impossible to believe that he is not pneumatical inflated.

Of the "sights" of St. Petersburg there is n room here to speak in detail Easily first amo them is the Hermitage Gallery of art and Russian antiquities. It is wonderfully rich Van Dycks, Rembrandts and Rubens, and its doz-Raphaels would alone be worth the journey fro Florence to St. Petersburg to see. There is o little Raphael, a "Virgin and Child," almost miniature in size-indeed, it is not over six inch in diameter and circular-which is of more val than many acres of canvas less lovingly painte Czar Alexander II. gave it to his wife as a silv wedding present, and I shall never cease to thi the better of him for it. The Winter Palace is fitting habitation for the most brilliant con in Europe. It is so vast that two hot scarcely suffices for a hasty stroll through almost endless suites, and its materials and wor manship are everywhere of the costliest. Wha especially admired in it was the exquisite ta exhibited in its decorations and furnishings. most anybody can furnish a house tastefully wh only a moderate sum has to be expended, but takes genius to lavish the resources of an emp upon a palace without degenerating into offens gaudiness. The harmony with which the co schemes are carried out in the various apa ments of the Winter Palace is one of the m pleasing things of its kind to be seen anywhere

The lover of art will go from the Hermi's which ranks as one of the half dozen fin galleries in Europe, to the so-called Alexan Palace, which contains an extensive collection Russian pictures, where the progress of Russ art and its contemporary products can be studi as nowhere else. Then there is the Museum Imperial Carriages, a thing which, so far a know, is without a parallel anywhere, for it co tains the carriages and harness used at coronation of nearly a dozen czars. I knew whether to wonder most at the reckless west represented by such magnificence of gilt crimson velvet, or at the crudity of taste wha conceives these gorgeous circus wagons to be most fitting emblem of the imperial dignity the most appropriate conveyance for the impel person. As for the churches-or "cathedrals," they call four or five of the largest-they must; mentioned later. The Great Bazaar is well wo visiting. It is a group of innumerable little sh? in a vast building which covers several squares sort of department store, in which each list section is owned and operated independently, where any commodity from a biscuit to a bass drum can be purchased at prices that depend chiefly on the purchaser's skill in driving a bargain. I was told by a Russian gentleman that in all commercial transactions except ordinary retail a pot of tea or (more often) a bottle of champagne is considered an indispensable accessory, and that the cost of the sparkling accelerator of trade sometimes exceeds the value of the bargain consummated under its influence.

One of the most interesting acquaintances which I made during my few days in the Russian capital was a young American who had just returned from a trip through Siberia to the Mongolian border. He was enthusiastic over the beauty and richness of the country, the excellence of the Siberian railway and the cheapness of the excursion. It was his prediction that within a year or two there will be a gold boom in Siberia which will put the Klondike country to shame. This is a free tip. I give it for what it is worth, but distinctly disclaim all responsibility for its accuracy. At any, rate Siberia is known to be a great country for precious minerals and produces the world's greatest supply of malachite and lapis lazuli.

. But St. Petersburg is not Russia. It is scarcely even Russian. Originally created by the flat of Peter the Great to be an instrument for the Europeanization of Russia, it has been molded more by western European than by Russian influences. It disputes with Constantinople the honor of being the most cosmopolitan city in Europe. Every language is spoken upon its streets. With the street venders and cabbies. to be sure, one must dicker in Russian (an acquaintance with the numerals is sufficient for that); but almost any well-dressed man can be relied upon to reply intelligibly to a question in French or German. My Russian informant, above referred to, told me that his little girl spoke German. French and Russian so fluently that she scarcely knew which was her native tongue and was also fairly at home in English. St. Petersburg is European and cosmopolitan. Moscow is Asiatic. To get the typical Russian city one must add them together and divide by two. characteristics of Russia are its cosmopolitanism and the fact that it is the borderland where Europe and Asia meet and mingle.

Fly to Pieces.

THE EFFECT OF COFFEE ON HIGHLY ORGANIZED PEOPLE.

"I have been a coffee user for years, and about two years ago got into a very serious condition of dyspensia and indigestion. It seemed to me I would fly to pieces. I was so nervous that at the least noise I was distressed, and many times could not straighten myself up because of the pain.

"My physician told me I must not eat any heavy or strong food and ordered a diet, giving me some medicine. I followed directions carefully, but kept on using coffee and did not get any better. Last winter my husband, who was away on business, had Postum Food Coffee served to him in the family where he boarded.

"He liked it so well that when he came home he brought some with him. We began using it and I found it most excellent. While I drank it my stomach never bothered me in the least, and I got over my nervous troubles. When the Postum was all gone we returned to coffee, then my stomach began to hurt me as before and the nervous conditions came on again.

"That showed me exactly what was the cause of the whole trouble, so I quit drinking coffee altogether and kept on using Postum Food Coffee. The old troubles left again and I have never had any trouble since." Anna Coen, Mt. Ephraim, O.

B. B. Tyler's Letter.

Iowa is "our modern Mesopotamia." The "Father of Waters" is on the east, the "Big Muddy" is on the west. It is one of our most stable commonwealths. Its people are fair minded, judicial, calm, serene, conservative. There are no bloodcu dling incidents connected with the early settlement of Iowa. It is pre-eminently an agricultural region, but the fact that beneath almost one-half of its area are rich deposits of coal will have an influence in the development of manufactures. The surface of the state is a rich loam from a foot to three hundred feet deep. The average Iowan pedigrees back to New England. The time was, and it may be true now, when the rate of illiteracy in Iowa was lower than in any other state. Iowa became a territory in 1838. In 1846 it became a state. The first locomotive entered the state in 1856. This was the beginning of great things. The state is fairly gridironed with railroads, but last year almost nine hundred miles of road were built in this latter-day Mesonotamia. The farmers of Iowa are intelligent men. They work with their heads and not alone with their hands. They think. The Interstate Commerce Law was carried through the Senate by men from Iowa. Do you recall this fact: Cattle were brought from the remote West to Chicago for fifty dollars a carload while the railroads demanded seventy dellars for transporting a similar herd from Western Iowa to Chicago? The farmers saw this discrimination and were justly indignant. The tillers of the soil are a power in this part of the world. If they do not make laws they send men to Washington with instructions as to the kind of laws that must be enacted. And why not? About eight and a half millions of their rich acres are annually planted in corn. The annual corn harvest is in the neighborhood of three hundred millions of bushels. About eighty per cent of the corn grown in Iowa is fed to cattle and hogs. The dairy interests are enormous. It is said that there are a thousand co-operative creameries in Iowa. Corn, cow, hog-these three in this great state! Which is the greatest I will not attempt to say. All are great. Great also is the Iowa hen. Equally great is the Iowa goat. Great, too, is the Iowa pigeon. "At Osage they will show you a township of pigeon houses four acres in area." The retired farmer is much in evidence in this state. He is in all the towns. He has made "his pile" and has gone to town to live and enjoy it. I wonder when he made his money, and how. I can testify from personal knowledge that for the last forty years he has complained of short crops and hard times. But here he is, living in town without labor. He lives in his own house, too. The retired farmer does not pay rent-not he! He receives rent. In New England the urban drift is a struggle for existence; in Iowa, and for that matter in all the states of the Middle West, the movement is toward luxury, refinement and reposeful ease. It is said that in Des Moines "one may go a long and crooked mile among the cheery dwellings of wealthy retired farmers." He is a great mystery-the retired farmer is.

The people of Iowa, in the main, are conservatively religious. One has said: "Were I a public event and about to occur, the Hawkeye State is the last place I should select for my occurrence." It was in this state, you remember, that Prof. George D. Herron attempted to exploit his gospel of Christian Socialism. The effect was merely to harden the hearts of the Iowans. This is no place for blatherskites and demagogues. The Iowans have no Sunday trains except on main lines. There are Adventists, Mormons, Quakers, Spiritualists and Christian Scientists, as well as Evangelicals, but all are conspicuously conservative.

This is a good field for the Disciples of Christ. The genuine true-blue Disciple is distinguished for his plain, practical, matter-of-fact common sense. He does not cultivate poetry. If he reads, and probably he does, he prefers history to fiction. He is not æsthetic. "Give me the facts," is his demand. The old-fashioned Disciple revels in logic. Proof-texts thrill his soul. Nothing makes him happier than pertinent Scripture texts. The more of them the better for him. For a man with these peculiarities in his religious make-up Iowa, with its peculiar characteristics, is a fine field.

Statistics for 1899 show that the Christian Church in this state has, or had, 432 congregations, 379 houses of worship, 357 preachers, 50,000 members, and that $4,443 were raised for mission work in this commonwealth. Eighteen men have been at work in this field as missionaries during the current year. Material help has been given by the Iowa Christian Convention to fifty five churches. Twenty-three churches, valued at $63,000, have been dedicated this missionary year. Eleven new houses of worship are in course of erection. Eight buildings have been erected in county seat towns. Thirteen congregations have been organized and five dead churches have been resuscitated.

Drake University is an object of pride to the Disciples of Christ in Iowa. And why not? All Disciples in all this broad land have reason to be proud of Drake University. It is a great school and it increases in magnitude and efficiency year by year. The first Lord's day in July is "Drake University Day" in all the Christian Churches in Iowa. This is a real university. There is the College of Letters and Sciences, the College of the Bible, the Normal College, the College of Oratory, the School of Art, the Summer School of Methods, the College of Pharmacy, the College of Law and the College of Physicians and Surgeons. The total number of students in all departments during the last year was 1,593. The catalog is a book of nearly two hundred pages. The recent addition of Prof. Clinton Lockhart to the faculty of the College of the Bible will add much strength to that department. It is proposed to make the Bible course so strong that the best students will be attracted. Prof. Lockhart has a text-book on "Hermeneutics" in the press-if it has not already appeared. In order to assist young men to complete a regular course of study in preparation for tho ministry, the Hon. T. W. Phillips has donated $5,000. During the year $65,000 was raised to pay off the old indebtedness; one-half of this amount was paid by Gov. Drake. The endowment fund has been largely increased. The outlook was never more encouraging than at the present time. Send to Chancellor W. Bayard Craig, Des Moines, Iowa, for catalog.

For some weeks I have tried to speak to you about "Alexander Campbell's Theology," a book of three hundred pages, from the pen of W. E Garrison and the press of the Christian Publishing Company.

This is a good book. I am almost persuaded to use the word remarkable in my characterization of the work. It is remarkable in its thoroughness, in its clearness, in its freedom from prejudice, in its judicial balance. This is, remember, the work of a young man. The author was born of Disciple parents, grew up in a Disciple home, is a Disciple by conviction, and a member of the Christian Church in good standing and full fellowship. Now, when you remember these things, if you have read the book I think you will agree with me that the work of Winfred Ernest Garrison is remarkable. The book is as calm, cool, impartial as the deliverance of a judge giving instruction to a jury in an important trial. The fact that Alexander Campbell was human. and that being human he had his limitations, is constantly recognized. It is, of course, assumed that Alexander Campbell had a theology. The author inquires into the sources of Mr. Campbell's theological system. It seems to me that he has placed his finger on the sources of Alexander Campbell's Theology with marvelous accuracy. Generally, Campbell is right. Sometimes he is wrong. This is the position of the author. He does not say so in so many words; but this impression he leaves on the mind of the reader.

The author ought to cite his sources more frequently. The reader here and there is inclined to say: "What, sir, is your authority for this or that statement?"

The most serious fault of the book is a failure to recognize the fact that Alexander Campbell's theology was a growth. Mr. Campbell himself grew. He was not the man in 1820 that he was in 1850. The evolution of Mr. Campbell's views on the design of baptism is set forth by the author briefly.

Will some one now give us a study of Alexander Campoell from 1820, the date of his first discussion, or 1823, the time of the beginning of the Christian Baptist, to about the year 1850?

New York Letter.

Once again we are at home in New York and at the post of duty, which after a month's delightful rest becomes a new joy. There was not so much physical inertia as mental change, and so we are enabled to bring a renewed mind to the heavy but always pleasant duties of the ministry. Nothing perhaps does a tired mind more good than to get far away from the associations of one's work and look upon other faces and other scenes for a time. Besides this the memories of vacation experiences are restful when recalled. One of the most pleasant of all the features of the past vacation was the happy family reunion at Father Madden's on the old farm at Beaver Ridge, Knox county, Tenn., on Sunday, August 26th. The old folks, all their living children except one, and all their grandchildren were present. The family dinner was served that day out under the shade trees in the yard. It was a beatiful diningroom, ceiled with sky-blue, trimmed in flecks of white clouds and beautiful tree-green all about, with grass green carpet, soft as velvet. There were twenty-three of us together, ten of whom were grandchildren. Just as all were seated a photograph of the group at the table was taken. The old people were very happy to have their children and grandchildren gathered about them at the table, apparently realizing that we all might not be permitted so to meet again, on this earth at least. Many changes may take place in a short time, for the old people are aging rapidly and the children are fast growing up toward manhood's estate. We should remember, however, that all these earthly ties are made to be broken, but there are ties not of this earth, which even death cannot sever.

On the journey home via the Norfolk & Western Railroad we passed through some of the most interesting historic sections of our beloved country. Between Johnson City and Bristol our train crossed the beautiful Watanga River, along the banks of which lived those early settlers of Scotch-Irish blood who in 1772 formed the Watanga Association, which was absolutely the first free government with democratic institution formed on the American continent. The republics of Cumberland and Transylvania were lineal descendants of this small but noble mother state. The Watanga Association was the first of all the American commonwealths or confederations to declare in favor of universal suffrage and unqualified religious liberty. Not many miles from Bristol, where Reedy Creek empties into the North Fork of the Holston River, is a noted locality in the early history of Tennessee. At this point there is an island in the river known as Long Island, near which Fort Patrick Henry was erected in 1758, by Col. William Byrd, under the advice of Washington. At this place also Richard Henderson and his company made the Watanga treaty with the Cherokee Indians in March, 1775, which instrument plays an important part in the after history of Kentucky and Tennessee. Going on eastward along the line of the railroad we touched here and there many places of historic interest. In the vicinity of Wythville we came near Fort Chiswell, which was erected by Col. Byrd and named in honor of Col. John Chiswell. who was then in charge of the lead works near by, from which was obtained the principle supply of lead used in the Revolutionary War and also the Confederate supply used in the Civil War. In 1750 Dr. Thomas Walker and his party of explorers (the first known to have explored East Tennessee and Kentucky) passed through this section. North of Radford near Blacksburg is the place of the historic pioneer settlement of Ingles, or Draper's Meadows, formed by a party whose leader was William Ingles, and which on the 8th of July, 1755 (the day before Braddock's defeat), was almost wholly exterminated by a cruel band of Shawnee Indians from Ohio. William Preston, one of the settlers who escaped afterwards, made Draper's Meadows his home and called it Smithfield. The perils and hardships of Mrs. William Ingels, who became a captive under the Shawnees, makes a thrilling story. So the ride over this road is interesting indeed to one who delights to recall the heroic lives of the pioneer settlers and valorous deeds of our American forefathers and foremothers. And it seemed that the charming sail from Norfolk to New York on the palatial steamer "Hamilton," of the Old Dominion Line, was but a fitting conclusion of a most delightful and restful vacation. We are glad to have had this opportunity to rest and only regret that all tired toilers can not enjoy the same.

But the home coming had, as usual, its tinge of sadness. For in every single instance we have been called to sorrow with loved ones in Christ at the end of the summer's rest. This time it is with two of our young lady members, Misses Belle E. and Bertha Fox, and their sisters and brothers, who have been called upon to part with their best friend and counselor-mother. An operation became necessary, which as such was successful, but she proved too weak to rally from the effects, and passed over the river on Friday, Aug. 3rd, within a few hours after the surgeon did his work. While it is hard for all to bear this grief, it is especially so to Miss Belle, who is traveling in Europe and to whom the sad news could not be communicated, though repeated cablegrams were sent. She cannot know of the great sorrow that awaits her until she arrives in New York on the 8th of September. But she, with her brothers and sister have the comfort of knowing that their mother was a good woman and a true, devoted mother, who always did her duty as she saw it, with a loyal, loving heart. We pray for them that their faith fail not in these dark days of deep sorrow. May the good Lord bless and keep that family of three young men and three young women beref; of their mother.

Let those belated churches which have not as yet made an offering this autumn to the cause of Church Extension do so without fail. No congregation among us can afford not to have fellowship in this work, for Church Extension is one of the wisest organized missionary movements of modern times. The new organization at Newark, N. J., in whose welfare we have been deeply interested, has received an appropriation from the Church Extension Board that brings great encouragement to the little band there. Let us do all we can for this fund and it will be increased to $250,000 by September 30th, and many churches will be assisted in their work of saving souls.

Washington (D. C.) Letter.

While visiting relatives in Merchantville, N. J., this summer, I had the privilege of spending a Lord's day in Philadelphia, preaching at the First Christian Church in the morning and witnessing in the afternoon and evening the practical working of certain Christian enterprises that have made the City of Brotherly Love famous.

It was pleasant to note the eagerness with which the congregation of the First Church awaits the coming of their pastor elect, Robert G. Frank, of Fulton, Mo. His charming personality and eloquent sermons made a most favorable impression upon the occasion of his recent visit. If any one questions the wisdom of calling a man under thirty to such a responsible position the brethren of the First Church tell of the labors of Henry Schell Lobengier and C. Q. Wright, who were but little past their majority when they came to the Philadelphia pastorate. In addition to this hopeful spirit which seems to pervade the entire congregation, the new pastor will find that he has one of our largest and handsomest church edifices located in the center of a thickly settled residence district, and such efficient and helpful colaborers as Dr. E. E. Montgomery, Henry B. and Kinley J. Tener, W. D. Ferguson, W. T. C. Sanders, J. W. Mulholland and Walter S. Burns. The latter, a recent addition from St. Louis, is superintendent of the Sunday-school.

In the afternoon I was able to gratify a long-cherished desire in a visit to the famous Bethany Sunday school, of which John Wanamaker is superintendent. I had heard of the attendance running up into the thousands, the thorough organization of the departments, the soul-stirring singing, the perfect order, the instructive teaching of the lesson, etc., etc., and had often grown discouraged as I had contrasted the work and results in the congregations to which I had ministered.

I found myself on the platform at 2 P. M., waiting for the solemn hush that would fall upon the school when the bell tapped. For had I not heard that once there was some disorder after the opening of the session and Mr. Wanamaker had rushed from the room, and only after many tears and entreaties could he be persuaded to come back and resume the lesson, and how the school had never forgotten this harrowing experience? There was less confusion during the opening service than in the average school, for guards at all the doors refused entrance to late comers, but I noticed a number of scholars whispering and talking and under the superintendent's eye there was disorder that would not be tolerated in some schools I kuow. "We will sing the last hymn composed by our late lamented chorister," announced the superintendent. It sounded as if the chorister, orchestra and school had struck into different tunes and I felt almost glad the author was not alive to hear it. After one verse they gave it up. The attendance was 1,812, which was only one-third of the total enrollment and 200 less than for the corresponding Sunday of 1899. Deducting the visitors and members of the Bible Union (Mr. Wanamaker's class) present, the attendance was but slightly in excess of the attendance at the Ninth Street school, Washington, upon a recent Lord's day. It is perhaps not fair to judge this school by a visit in midsummer, when the superintendent has had a prolonged absence on account of sickness and the church is depressed by the removal of their beloved pastor, Wilbur R. Chapman. However, I was glad I happened along at this time

It was heartening to learn that the greatest school on earth had its periods of depression, that its machinery does not run without some jolts and that the distance between one's own and the best is not unattainable.

In the late afternoon I attended a Y. M. C. A. service in a large tent owned by the Presbyterians. No expense had been spared to make the place attractive and comfortable. A well-built floor prevented dust and nine electric fans kept the audience cool. A trained orchestra and skilled musician led the singing. The preaching was simple, earnest, practical. I was told that the Presbyterian Churches of Philadelphia were conducting an evangelistic campaign in six such tents in the crowded districts of the city. The ablest city pastors, assisted by several distinguished evangelists from out of town, were preaching twice a day in these tents. During the week of my visit there was a total attendance of 13.000. and 152 persons had signed cards reading: "It is my purpose to lead a Christian life.'

This is the second year such meetings have been held and it is said the interest is increasing. No other denomination in the East is so well provided with men and means to carry on such a campaign. If the Presbyterians of all of our cities should follow the worthy example set by their Philadelphia brethren, this church would not make such a lamentable showing in their annual reports.

The Temple, Russell Conwell's great church, does not advertize in the daily papers, but every one has heard of the great building with a seating capacity of 5,000, the Temple College, where 6,000 students receive daily instruction and the gracious work of the Samaritan Hospital. I had heard that the crowds were so great that admission was by ticket and there was to be heard the largest permanent choir in the world, whose annual expense for sheet music was over $400. I learned that the reign of the dog star had a depressing effect upon a great church as well as upon a great Sanday-school.

The evening service was held in the Lower Temple, which has 2,000 sittings. About one-half of them were taken. There was no choir and not even a chorister. Mr. Conwell called for the organist, but no one responded. This did not embarrass this resourceful man, for he took his place at the organ, struck a few chords and led in the singing of a good old hymn that could not have been more spiritual had all the choir been present. I had stopped at the Temple at the close of the morning service and met Mr. Conwell. "Are you to preach to night?" I asked. "Yes," he answered. "If I can get anything together." "Something gotten together" is a good description of the sermon he delivered. It was thoroughly enjoyed by the large audience and a deep impression seemed to be made.

In 1890, at Yale Divinity School, Russell Conwell, then pastor of Grace Baptist Church, meeting in the building now occupied by the First Christian congregation, gave a talk to the students. I remember he said: "There are every Sunday evening at my church just seven conversions. There were seven last Sunday and the Sunday before and there will be seven next Sunday I cannot account for it but the fact is as I state. Robt. Burdette in his "femple and the Templars" says: "In 1887 and for five years thereafter, every week, seven persons, no more and no less, arose to ask for prayers or to make application to be admitted for church membership." When the preacher gave the invitation upon the occasion of my visit I found myself watching with considerable interest the result. Sure enough, there were exactly seven who went forward to receive the right hand of fellowship. Mr. C. made the statement that he had received during his pastorate 3.700 persone.

A Philade'phia Press reporter once said to Dr. George A. Pelz, then associate pastor of Grace Church: "If you were to express in three words the secret of the mysterious power that has brought together this great membership, built this Temple, founded a college, opened a hospital and set every man, woman and child in the congregation to working, what would it be?" "Sanctified common sense," was the answer.

A Word From Germany.

DEAR SIR AND BROTHER:-We are about to leave Germany. During my brief stay in this country I found that it will be very difficult to establish our plea in Germany. The greatest opposition is the Lutheran Church. While the Lutheran and Roman Catholic Churches are not on the best of terms, they are established churches and succeed only through their iron rules. Theology rather than Christianity is their motto. The Methodist people seem to make headway in many cities in a semi-secret way. The only way to bring about a change is to live among the people and teach them. In many places the people gladly hear our plea, but without a permanent organization and continuous working among the people nothing can be done. The educated class among the people are intelligent and reasonable. Their idea of religion is not a mystery, but an established fact; and this fact must be taught, for it is only taught in part. I heard a very prominent minister say that "Lydia's children were also baptized," and the "Lord must open the hearts of people after baptism." This would be a great field for missions. Something must be done before JOHN G. M. LUTTENBERGER.

Minnesota Letter.

The Minnesota Christian Missionary Society held its forty-third annual convention at St. Paul, Aug. 21-25. It was one of the best conventions in the history of our work in this state and promises better things for the future.

The first half day was devoted to the Ministerial Association, which has for many years been in rather a chaotic state. In the absence of David Husband, the president, H. T. Sutton, the vicepresident, occupied the chair in a very acceptable manner. Henry Goodacre, the secretary, having moved out of the state, H. D. Williams was selected for that service. The one feature of this meeting of the preachers was a paper by A. D. Harmon, of St. Paul, on Walter Scott's book, "The Messiah," and the discussion of the paper and book by a number of other preachers. Bro. Harmon's paper was a very clear and forcible analysis of the book from the sympathetic standpoint. It was just such a thoughtful, incisive paper as was expected from the writer.

At the close of this meeting the preachers made arrangements for the better organization of their society and for a meeting with a good program about April 1, 1901. The new officers elected were as follows: President, H.T. Sutton, Redwood Falls; Vice-President, J. K. Shellenberger, Madelia; Secretary, H.D. Williams, Mankato.

The second afternoon of the convention was used by the C. W. B. M. and it was universally conceded that their program surpassed in practical interest any other part of the proceedings. Mrs. A. D. Harmon, wife of the St. Paul pastor, presided with her well known tact and business ability. The number of good papers presented were too numerous to receive separate mention here. Miss Adelaide Gail Frost, of India, was there and delivered one evening address and several short talks on the spur of the moment. Her talks are intensely interesting and convey a very vivid impression of conditions on the missionary field. Her mother, Mrs. Julia Frost, of Hiram, Ohio, was with her and added greatly to the profit of the convention.

The chief features of the missionary convention were the president's address, the reports of officers, the evening addresses and the reports of committees. The president's address was a frank and practical presentation of some things necessary to our growth in Minnesota. The report of the corresponding secretary, J. K. Shellenberger, showed a net gain of only about 200 during the past year. It showed, however, that on the whole the churches are in an improved condition and ready for a larger growth during the coming year. Secretary Shellenberger has proven himself the right man for the work. He has shown himself an indefatigable worker at his desk and in the field, equally efficient at preaching or managing missionary work. His annual report, given to the convention by means of a map and a large statistical chart was one hard to improve upon.

The committee on future work reported in favor of "enlargement" and the report involving more money, more work and an additional evangelist was unanimously adopted.

A faction which, under the leadership of J. Stuart Miller, had withdrawn from the church at Austin, appealed to the convention for recognition The affair was turned over to a committee which investigated as fully as possible and reported sustaining the action of the Board which had refused to recognize the faction.

A resolution was passed in favor of centering all our educational interests about the University of Minnesota at Minneapolis and asking the National C. W. B. M. to take the management of Bible Chair work at that point.

The officers elected for the coming year were: President, A. D. Harmon; Vice-President, C. J.

Tanner; Recording Secretary, M. B. Ainsworth; Treasurer, Dr. O. H. Hall; Auditor, M. P. Givens; Corresponding Secretary, J. K. Shellenberger.

B. L. Smith, of Ciacinnati, was present and occupied one evening in putting "Home Missions to the front" by means of his great address on "Visions of Work."

F. E. Meigs was also present and spoke twice on China and its conditions. He delivered the concluding address of the convention and gave such a lucid explanation of present conditions in China as had not been before heard in the twin cities.

The last afternoon was occupied by the Endeavorers. Your scribe was not able to be present, but has heard that it was a very profitable meeting. H. T. Sutton, of Redwood Falls, was chosen state superintendent of Endeavor work and Miss Mate Maxwell, of Duluth, state superintendent of Bible-schools.

At one point of the convention the following new preachers were introduced: C. J. Tanner, Minneapolis; C. A. Burridge, Rochester; W. H. Knotts, Litchfield; R. M. Ainsworth, Garden City; J. H. Carr, Concord; W. S. Lemmon, Ronneby. Perhaps others came in later, but I do not now recall them. W. W. Devine, of Luther, Mich., was present as a visitor and he may move over among us. May some of our churches secure his services.

The convention had good music. There were several good solos, but the music that impressed me was that furnished by M. P Givens and David Husband, two princely singers, who sang a number of duets as very few men can sing.

Bro. Husband, after nine years of faithful service in this state, was just on the verge of his departure to Waitsburg, Wash., having resigned the pastorate at Olive to accept at Waitsburg. He will be greatly missed from the work in this state. The convention gave several expressions of its regard for him, of regret at his removal and of hope for his success in his new field.

Henry Goodacre, who was at Redwood Falls and and has just left the state, could not be at the convention. C. M. McCurdy also had just left the state and we missed the pleasure of seeing him.

H. D. WILLIAMS.

Mankato, Minn. Aug. 28, 1900.

Texas Letter.

In this day when there are so many clashes between the whites and blacks, both North and South, and some think that a war of races is imminent, it is refreshing to recall the old-time devotion of the negro to his master. Here is a case in point. Col. W. W. Lang, a Confederate officer, recently died in Oak Cliff. At the time the Southern army was driven from Kentucky Col. Lang was too sick to accompany his command, and he was left behind and expected soon to become a prisoner. But Byron, his bodyguard, who is still living, was equal to the emergency and saved his master from capture. He secured a wheelbarrow, and with blankets made it as comfortable as possible, and placing the sick man in it he tenderly wheeled his precious charge through slush and mud, up hill and down, for twenty-five miles and landed him safe within the Confederate lines. It is the regret of every good man that a people whose interests are one and whose devotion used to be so genuine and beautiful, should ever becom alienated.

That we have not entirely broken with the past is evident from the following: The Red River Association of Primitive Baptists have withdrawn fellowship from the New Hope Association because the preachers of the association teach the doctrine of absolute predestination of all things that come to pass. But we are not the people to make much of such a thing as this, lest some one ask us about the organ, Endeavor Societies etc.,

WE BUY lamp-chimneys by the dozen; they go on snapping and popping and flying in pieces; and we go on buying the very same chimneys year after year.

Our dealer is willing to sell us a chimney a week for every lamp we burn.

Macbeth's "pearl top" and "pearl glass" do not break from heat; they are made of tough glass. Try them.

Our "Index" describes all lamps and their proper chimneys. With it you can always order the right size and shape of chimney for any lamp. We mail it FREE to any one who writes for it.

in certain parts of our moral vineyard. This thing of living in glass houses is a delicate and dangerous business.

Metz Joiner, a little boy eight years old, is creating a sensation in Dennison as a preacher. W. B. Carnes, our preacher there, reports a sermon on the parable of the virgins, which he pronounces a "sound discourse." Bro. Carnes says he does not memorize, but is original in his thoughts and ill strations, and he thinks if he is properly trained the child will grow into a "great man." He fears, however, that he is being "pushed too hard," and states that at the close of his sermons "he drops into his mother's arms and is soon fast asleep." His father died when the child was one year old and since then the mother has made her living at the washtob. Little Metz joined the Baptist Church about a year ago, and he claims that he has been called and sent of God, and that the Holy Spirit guides him.

A. Lynn Clinkerbeard, of Missouri, has become pastor of the church at Wichita Falls. This is a good church in a great field, and we welcome our brother to it and pray for his success.

The Gainesville church is appreciative. J. B. Sweeney has done them a great work as pastor, and the other day they gave him substantial evidence of their appreciation in the form of a handsome surrey and harness. Sweeney will preach better, the church will hear better and the people will be gospelized better because of this gift. May this deed have many repetitions.

C. L. Cole has closed a meeting at Rockett, and one of its good results is that they will have a new house soon.

W. H. Stewart, of Irby, one of our old veterans, is old, feeble and blind. How sweet to think of the rich reward in store for these faithful soldiers of the cross.

W. K. Homan has resigned as editor of the Christian Courier. This is sad news to its readers. His name has been at the head of the paper during its entire existence, and we had come to regard him as part and parcel of the institution. He has stood by it through many a dark experience, and fought its battles when they were hard to fight, and our people should not and will not forget him. His successor has not been chosen-

Bro. Homan goes back to his first love, the law; and he and his son, Juo. P. Homan, will locate in Colorado City, Texas. May a glorious success crown his labors. M. M. DAVIS.

The Iowa Convention.

The thirty-first annual session of the Iowa istian Convention was held at the University Irch, Des Moines, Sept. 3-7.

The attendance was about average in numbers, hardly an average in a representative sense. proximity of the National Convention, both in ance and date, was detrimental, as many ught they could not attend both and chose the ater.

The C. W. B. M. was very properly and most phatically in the lead, and will be increasingly in Iowa and else there, until the churches on from them to systematize their work from state down through the districts to the minuof the work in the auxiliary or congregation. By reported total receipts of more than $8,000, though compelled to compress their work into fourth the time of the convention, they did it wirably, and had an excellent attendance. As y appointed a reporter for the C. E., will only that the presence and addresses of Mrs. Helen Moses, national corresponding secretary, Miss slaide Gail Frost, of India, and Kate V. John, of Japan, were inspiring.

orof. Clinton Lockhart gave three morning leces on "The Seven Letters of Christ," which refull of excellent points and very profitably reduced the proceedings of the day.

C. C. Mabry, an attorney of Centerville, Iowa, ored the convention with a very excellent adss on "The Miracle of the Seed"

The I. C. C. reported work done by district angelist, a part of the year each, in four of the districts of the state. The following is aned from the summary of the report of the ord:

To be some presented the work of the Benevot Association with all the earnestness of his heart and good lungs. B. L. Smith portrayed his well-known style the great interests comted to the A. C. M. S.

F. E. Meigs held the audience spell-bound in a cyclear and comprehensive statement of the uses of the trouble in China and the relation of emissionaries to it. He holds the avarice of Hung Chang and of Great Britain and other wers responsible and insists that the people in the missionaries. Church Extension was presented by J. W. Hastie and the American ble Society by Rev. L. W. Dickinson, of St. Paul, ent for the Northwest.

An excellent Bible school session was opened by a irrepressible W. B. Clemmer with an address "The Organized Bible-school," followed by the Home Department—an Open Door," by R. Sargent, of the largest Home Department in wa—Mason City; "The Supplemental Lessons,"

M. Hedge; "The Four-in-hand Bible-school am—the Parent, Child, Superintendent, Pastor," J. M. Rudy; "The Teacher's Training," by G. Burch, and "The Bible-school and State Misons," by W. H. Scott; clising with a very lively iz directed at W. B. Clemmer.

The great address of the convention was by W. Richardson, of Kansas City, on "Paramount aportance of State Missions." Iowa makes a ofound bow to Missouri for sending us one of sest few remaining patriarchs and uncovered a large amount of history to the younger host, in an excellent account of "Our Olden Time State Meetings." Beginning in 1854, and tracing them through the early years of heroic struggle and the period of great mass meetings, at the time of chicken harvest, when the people came long distances by private conveyance, when the "houses were larger inside" than now and "one room would lodge a dozen," down to the modern "convention."

Very appropriately following this was an address by the honored father in our Iowa Israel, W. A McConnell, on "Helps Necessary to the Successful Propagation of the Gospel."

The session closed with a report of the progress of Drake University, by Chancellor W. B. Craig, showing that the year has witnessed the payment of $65,000 indebtedness; the erection of the fine new auditorium and other building improvements amounting to $25,000; the removal of the medical department from down town to the university buildings, made possible by the additional room; the reorganization of the music department which will be made one of the strongest in the West; new rooms for the business department; a material addition to the pharmaceutical library; the addition of Profs. Clinton Lockhart and O. B. Fallis to the faculty, and, although last, by no means least, the fact of 1,593 students last year and prospect of 1,800 this coming year. Moral: Send your young people to Drake University and some of your surplus to its endowment fund.

The principal officers of the board was re-eleted.

The obituary report was made by Allen Hickey and by Mrs. Ella Huffman representing the C. W. B. M., and several special tributes were paid by others. The list included H. W. Everest, A. M. Atwater, L. C. Woolery and R. T. Mathews.

Chancellor Craig gave one of his enthusiastic educational addresses, without which no Iowa convention would be complete.

The closing session, as usual, was devoted to the Y. P. S. C. E., and was rendered very interesting and profitable by excellent papers and addresses by F. D. Ferrall, Pleasantville, Miss Dora M. Thomas, Fort Dodge, Miss Ruby Dale, Des Moines and Gilbert J. Ellis, Adel, on various phases of the question, concluding with reports of the London convention, by J. T. Nichols, Vinton, and J. M. Lucas, state superintendent, Des Moines —too large a subject to enter upon and one which will be heard everywhere.

Bro. W. D. Cree, of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST, was present one day and seemed to enjoy everything, from the chicken in the basement to the Missouri speech.

The fact that W. E. M. Hackleman was in charge of the music will indicate its character to the whole brotherhood.

Next year's convention will be at Cedar Rapids. S. C. SLAYTON.

Southern California Convention.

August 19th closed the convention of Southern Colifornia. It was held at Long Beach, beginning the 9th inst., lasting ten days. In many respects this was the best convention we ever had. The program was carried out with, I believe, but two exceptions, the speakers being absent, but the places were ably filled.

The addresses were of a high order, some of them far above the average convention addresses. The following board was elected for the coming year: H. C. Smither, president; F. M. Dowling, vice-president; J. P. Ralston, corresponding secretary; A. K. Crawford, treasurer, and additional, J. W. Utter, G. W. Pearl, G. K. Lewis and H. Eliot, Ward.

Something over $700 was raised to help the weak churches in Southern California. The Baptists were in convention at the same time and a committee consisting of A. C. Smither, F. M. Dowling and W. E. Crabtree were sent to bear fraternal greetings, to which the enclosed clipping was returned by a committee sent by their assembly. After its reading the convention arose and sang "Praise God," etc. JAS. F. STEWART.

State Mission Notes.

The very last time I can speak to you in the CHRISTIAN EVANGELIST, and I want every word to refer to our convention in some way. I know that we are all anxious that we shall have a great convention, even those preachers who thoughtlessly, or otherwise, have made arrangements to hold protracted meeting, during the time. It is the very strangest thing that a preacher will do this, or a church will allow it. Yet we hear of a prominent preacher within 50 miles of Moberly doing that very thing, and some others are sinning in the self-same way. The duty of the hour, the paramount duty, is attendance on the State Convention. No question of convenience or pleasure should be raised. Preacher and church, church and preacher, all alike should go to Moberly.

RAILROAD RATES.

These are as good as we have ever obtained, and all the trunk lines have granted it. One-fare round-trip tickets on sale Sept. 17, 18 good to return including the 21st. So you can make provision to stay during the whole time. Be there for the C. W. B. M. session, Monday afternoon, and J. H. Garrison's sermon Monday night on "The Triumphs of a Century," and don't forget that one of the very best things of the convention is that address by S. B. Moore, of St. Louis, on "The Heroic in Christianity," on the last night. Bro. Moore has not been in the state but little over a year, he is a man of remarkable power. Let us not fail to give him a hearty Missouri welcome and a great audience.

Conce more, in regard to your pledges. We need every cent we can get. We have promises, actual promises, on paper, in black and white, sufficient to put us out of debt. So many of these are not yet fulfilled and the convention is only one week away. I beg every preacher to see that his church sends in something for State Missions, or brings it to Moberly. We have been depending on you, if you fail us our report cannot be a very inspiring one. But if all who have made promises and all who ought to give, will send in their gifts we will make such a report as will thrill every heart in the state in this great church. We want this great joy, we need these funds, do not fail in any sense. Read again the article of Bro. Dutcher, he has been a noble helper through all the year, may God bless him and all his kind. Yours in His name,

T. A. ABBOTT.

The Flag and the Cross.

I have no hesitancy in saying that as an educational concert exercise the "Flag and the Cross," sent out by the Home Board for Children's Rally Day is superior to anything for the purpose I have ever seen. From beginning to end there is not a reading, a recitation, a song or a scenic display that is not highly educational as well as charming in its effect. It would seem to be im-possible for any one to take part in this exercise or hear it or even read it over without feeling more deeply the importance of Home Missions.

The pastor, the Sunday school superintendent, the teacher or the parent who does not avail himsolf of this occasion is neglecting the most favorsoir or this occasion is neglecting the most tavorable opportunity to advance the most important interest of the church and humanity, a matter sadly neglected, the development of interest in American missions. Send for it and carry it out, wholy or partially. It will do you good.

Those so situated that they cannot attend school sessions, taught by mail, as Principal John H. Schofield has had gratifyin success by this method of teaching. Mail students who will devote two hours daily to practice, cannot fail to obtain a general knowledge of shorthand in twenty weeks. This is a short time to acquire a proression that will enable persons to become self-supporting. Those who attend school generally graduated in about sixteen weeks, but this depends largely on the ability and general knowledge of the pupil.

As a knowledge of shorthand is of no pratical utility unless able to spill and compose correctly, students deficient in these lines are taught without extra charge. Shorthand and typewriting furnishes lucrative, as well as pleasant employment for both sexes, but more especially for young ladies, as there are always positions for those who are capable and competent.

Girls of To-day.

Girls of to day, give ear! Never, since time began Has come to the race of man A year, a day, an hour, So full of promise and power As the time that now is here.

Never in all the lands Was there a power so great To move the wheels of state, To lift up body and mind, To waken the deaf and blind, As the power that is in your hands.

Here at the gates of gold You stand in the pride of youth, Strong in courage and truth— Stirred by a force kept back Through centuries long and black-Armed with a power threefold.

Maid and mother and wife. See your own work is done; Be worthy a noble son. Help men in the upward way, Truly, a girl of to-day Is the strongest power in life.

A Headless Arrow

LUCIUS E. CHRISTIAN.

Never made an enemy flee. It never cleft the air in twain and struck the object that the being behind the bow intended it should strike. Why, an enemy would shake his spear and laugh at his opponent for using a headless arrow. He would consider the imperfect instrument of warfare as the stubble beneath his feet. One would be as harmless as the other. Every human being that has not a purpose in this life is a headless arrow. It is surprising how many thousands there are that are headless. It is not only surprising but also terrible. Terrible to that class of individuals, as well as to posterity and the general welfare of the national government. Ask the average high school graduate if he has plans for the future, if he has a purpose in life, and he will frankly admit that he does not know what he intends to do as a life's work. Aye, how can he? Graduating at sixteen or seventeen years of age, and thrown out on the cold, selfish and hurrying world. Ask him what he intends to do to keep body and soul together, and if his parents do not supply the wants he will wait until something turns up, forgetting that opportunity never kisses us while we sleep. A young man had graduated, and he went to his late instructor and said: 'Prof. Stafford, I have no purpose in life, as yet; what would you advise me to do?" The answer was characteristic but not the best: "Do that which comes to your hands. Do it well. Shirk no duty, be prompt and wait for something better." Many a youth is following that advise. They are waiting, just waiting, and living from hand to mouth. They are waiting for chances while golden opportunities are gliding by. Gliding by, because they were never taught to see opportunities, and we never see anything save what we have been taught to see. Waiting, but nothing comes to those who wait, save those things which are useless or detrimental to their progress. They who decide, find the purpose to complete the arrow, and get the courage to strike out for self, for home, God and native land. One has to "git up and git" and turn up something themselves if they ever expect to amount to anything in these days when people are crowding and pushing for the best that life offers to the diligent. A headless arrow goes by contraries. Every wind changes its direction, but years afterwards you will find it but a few rods from its starting-point. A headless human arrow rarely gets out of the old rut. It can never rise above the strata of conditions that it was born in. One may work day after day at the hardest toil, but unless the arrow is crowned by purpose, one cannot rise above the common mass of humanity. No, the arrow will lie there to blacken and to decay unless the germ of purpose quickens it to life. If the man had the opportunities of a boy, or if the boy had the experience of a man, many lives would be different. The boy wants to decide early what he intends make of himself.

"Decide not rashly. The decision made Can never be recalled. The gods implore not, Plead not, solicit not; they only offer Choice and occasion, which once being passed Return no more.'

A boy can reach forward and grasp the wisdom of his father's experience, if he but will, but his father can never reach back and lay hold upon the opportunities of youth, try as he may. The youth cannot afford to be a headless arrow very long. To let go the chances and the times of to-day is to let them go forever. He should question into the things that interest him most, then think and decide.

"How few there are who think, of all the thinking And some who never think at all, but only think they do. He should listen, but he should think and decide for himself, for things ought to be done according to plan. One should not jump at conclusions when such vital subjects are under consideration-vital to themselves, vital to posterity. Some are airaid to take a step into the future, but we have no more need to be afraid of the step just ahead of us than we have to be afraid of the one just behind us. The youth to be successful will find it needful to wear out the soles of his shoes as fast as he does the seat of his trousers, and he will find that traveling the road does one more good than all he gathers on the way, or finds waiting him when he achieves the goal. The youth may halt and wait for somebody or something to start him in life, and it cannot be denied that outward accidents conduce much to fortune, favor, death of others, occasion fitting virtue, but he will find that the mold of a man's fortune is in his own hands.

Yes, his hands contain the magic wand that will make his path smooth or stony. What shall be done with the great mass of headless human arrows? The great cause lies in our educational system. It is only textbook knowledge that the younger generation are getting. Their nervous systems are the rack. They need industrial work tween times. There is too much crowdin for the graduating goal in too short a tin The industrial work should be all that needed for the pupil's good. It should ta a large place on the course of study fro blacksmithing to doctoring. So, when t youth graduates he will have a purpose

Drifting with the tide; too many a doing that. Years ago parents bound the children out to learn a trade, now we ha got to the other extreme. Is there no ha way ground? Is there no way out of th difficulty that is the stumblingblock to many American youths?

"Lord God of nations, in this hour We bow to thee, we bow to thee, Before the clouds of arrows lower To darken land and sea. Lend us the purpose and the might, To do the right, to do the right." Alta, Iowa.

The City for the People.

A dumb man once upon a time took his meals on the plan of ordering a bill of fare entire and making the cook who presented the chosen bill his chef for the time being. Bills of fare were periodically presented to him by various cooks, and as the honor and rewards of being chef were very large, there was much strife among the cooks to secure the coveted success. But the dumb man was not happy. Hunger and indigestion frequently possessed him, for the bills of fare were not well adjusted to his tastes or needs and there was no method by which he could select what he liked from each bill and omit what he did not like. It was hash of mutton and rat tails, or puree of beans with asafetida flavor; custard of co-operative eggs and molten silver, or a pudding of golden bread, the milk of trusts and Filipino blood. The Democratic cook would feed the dumb man with liberty beans and a silver mush, almost certain to cause indigestion, distension and colic; while the Republican cook would serve a gold standard mush with imperial pie, made of exceedingly nauseous and indigestible material, sure to ferment and expand the poor man's vitals in a most painful manner. The poor man kept discharging the cooks as fast as their terms of employment expired, but without real relief, till he hit on the plan of requiring cooks to submit to him the particular articles of diet and the separate items or ingredients of the principal dishes, so that he might veto or cancel any dish or item of which he did not approve and so exclude it from the compounds that were to be swallowed by him. The new plan also required that the dumb man be furnished with blank sheets of paper, on which he might write the name of any dish he desired that may have been omitted from the lists furnished by the cooks. This plan is called the initiative and referendum, in order to frighten people who do not understand Latin, and since it went into effect the dumb man has been very happy, and indigestion, flatulence, colic and the distressful longing for something the cooks did not supply have all passed awayhis circulation is much better, back and feet not so cold as formerly and a number of loathsome sores are rapidly healing, some of them having disappeared entirely.

If you wish to know more about these powerful remedial agents, called the initiative and referendum, send for "The City for the People," by Professor Frank Parsons, "Equity Series" Nos. 3 and 4, double number, 50c., paper; $1, cloth. Address "Equity Series," 1520 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia.

Hating Evil.

an's Home Companion.

The psalmist says: "O, ye that love the Lord, hate evil." These few words mean much, and they also suggest a great deal. In the first place, they suggest that he who really loves the Lord must necessarily hate evil. We need to bear in mind the truth that pure love is not that wild sort of a sentiment which is incapable of hating anything. One would suppose, judging from what some people say of God's love, that it is such an amiable element that it never gets seriously and severely angry with anything which human beings say and do.

But the truth is, God's love for the good causes him to hate all manner of evil. His hatred of evil is as great as is his love for goodness and righteousness. And it follows that he who has much of God's love in his heart hates evil accordingly. If a professed Christian does not actually and expressly hate evil, then it is certain that he has not the love of the Lord in him, and therefore he is not a real Christian. The true Christian not only hates evil as an abstract principle, but he hates the evil which he discovers in himself. Christ says that he who does not hate "his own life" cannot be his disciple.

I understand this statement to mean that unless one hate the evil of his own life he cannot be a real disciple of Christ. I am sure that the true Christian does hate the evil qualities which exercise themselves within him. He hates the evil thoughts which come into his mind. He hates the uprisings of the spirit of jealousy which sometimes attempt to assert themselves. He hates the manifestation in himself of an inclination to render evil for evil. He also hates his natural bent to covetousness. These are some of the evil things in one's self which the real Christian hates. If a Christian have nothing in himself which he hates, then it is evident that he is blind to the actual condition of his own heart, however keen-sighted he may be in some respects.

It is a singular fact that many Christians who readily see evil in the conduct of other Christians fail to see any special evil in their own conduct. They will hate the evil which they see in others, but will excuse the evil which exists in themselves, calling it mistakes or failings or weaknessess or something besides actual evil. But observe that in hating evil as seen in others one must guard against indulging in hostile hatred of those who commit evil. It is often difficult to practically maintain this distinction. Anecdotes of the Chinese Emperor.

Naturally very little is known of the private life of the Emperor of China, but from time to time a few interesting facts crop up. The unhappy monarch is compelled to rise every morning at two o'clock. At three, by which time his toilet is completed, he re ceives the Ministers, and from that time till six is occupied with affairs of state. He breakfasts at nine, and dines at five in the afternoon. In spite of the great number of officials and servants in the palace, the poor man is perhaps the worst served master in the world. The menu for every day is written out a long time beforehand; and as it is by no means certain that such things as young vegetables and certain kinds of fruit are to be had on a given day, things are so badly arranged that they often make their first appearance on the Emperor's table when they have been in season at least a

The expenses of the Imperial kitchen are enormous, but with it all the Emperor has a sort of Barmecide feast.

In his capacity of High Priest the Emperor has to offer at least forty-six sacrifices to different gods in the course of a year; and as to each sacrifice is dedicated one or more holidays, which must be passed by him in complete solitude, the poor man's time must be pretty well taken up. Pete whistled louder than ever. "I don't," said Letitia. "Brother can whistle good" though."

"I can whistle," said Pete, though her statement was unnecessary. She continued to prove it.

"Pete," said Madge, "don't hold up the kittens by their tails.'

"Why?" said Pete. "Their mamma holds 'em up by one end, and I hold 'em up by the other. It's all the same to kittie, ain't it, you sweet 'ittle tine-sey kittie. Oh, Linda May, look at it clawing at the air. I'ts just like a turtle, ain't it? Where is they a handle to a cat if it ain't the tail?"

"Pete!" cried Madge, seizing the kitten and rescuing it; "I won't let you claim these kittens if you treat them that way."

"Come on, let's jump," cried Pete, who soon tired of any given subject. "What's the use of spending all our time over one thing when the world is so full of things."

Linda May seated herself on the hay with a kitten in her lap, and she was very happy. Letitia sat beside her. Madge and Pete began jumping on the hay. "Linda May don't jump," Madge announced to the rafters. "Aunt Dollie has raised her without any jump in her.'

"I can jump," said Linda May, being thus goaded. "Here, Letitia, hold my kitten." At first she was afraid, and after she jumped with wild enthusiasm, asking everybody to look at her. It was such fun to feel herself falling through the air, and then not get hurt! "I wish now I'd jumped over the fence," she said.

"I wish you had," said Pete; "and I wish Miss Dollie had come along just as you was going over. Wouldn't she have died? Whoo-ee!"

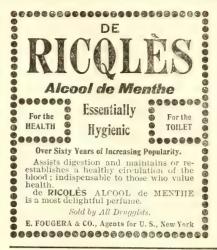

This reference to Miss Dollie touched Linda May's conscience. What would her aunt think of her present amusement? She sat down beside Letitia. It was sad that Miss Dollie didn't believe in little girls playing, but she didn't, and you had to take Miss Dollie as she was, or leave her

"What's the matter?" asked Madge.

"Aunt Dollie told me not to jump," said Linda May, "and I was just remembering

"Now, see that!" cried Madge turning upon Pete. "If you'd kept still she wouldn't have thought of it, and then it wouldn't have mattered. If you can just keep from remembering you was told not to do things you can do anything, and if you remember afterwards it don't hurt."

"Does me," said Linda May, "'Cause

Aunt Dollie always asks if I did it."

"Well, you've done it then," said Madge. "Yes, but Aunt Dollie does something else. Aunt Dollie whips!"

"Oh! Hard?"

"Yes, she does!" Linda May nodded emphatically.

"Oh!" said Madge. "Well, that's different. Mamma never whips us. She just makes us go to bed without supper. When we've been very bad we go and eat and eat and eat all we can, 'cause we know that's the last till next day. But it's funny sometimes, I can't eat when I want to! That time I got mad at Pete and jerked the big lamp out of her hand and smashed it I just went a-running to the press, 'cause I knew what was coming. But there was a kind of a something seemed in my throat nd I couldn't swallow. I guess it was scare."

At this moment Pete, who had been rumaging in a corner of the hav, shouted: "I've found something, I've found something, I found"-

"Do hush, Pete!" said Madge. "We're not deaf.'

"Thought you was. Come and see. Here's an old ragged thingajig—it's a coat! It's the very coat that tramp wore yesterday. Oh, girls! He slept up here last night."

"Let's get out of here," said Letitia. 'Ain't you afraid?"

"Yes, I am," said Linda May. "Come on,

Madge.

"You wait," said Pete. "Ain't I a detective? Ain't this coat a clew? If a coat ain't a clew, what is? And where there's coats there's pockets. They go together coats there's pockets. They go together—coats and pockets. Here's a match in this pocket. Shoo! they ain't any head on it. And this is empty. And this is all to pieces. And this is—oh, girls, here's a knife! Ain't it a whopper! Why, the blade would do for a dagger, I expect. It opens just as easy. Oh, here's rust all up and down the blade no, its blood!"

I'm gone!" cried Letitia, almost falling down the ladder.

"So'm I!" shouted Linda May, almost coming down upon Letitia's head. Madge scurried after them, and Pete came last, holding the knife between her teeth, with the coat tied about her by its long sleeves. "Ugh! take it off!" cried Madge. "Pete, you look scary.

Pete dropped the coat to the ground, and seizing the knife, rushed toward Letitia, shouting: "I'm a murderer! Look out!"
"At that moment a rough voice said: "Say, little gal, that's my knife!"

W. F. RICHARDSON.

THE DUTY OF WATCHFUL-NESS.*

After the parable of the Rich Fool, Jesus contined his discourse, directing it principally to his disciples. Against the cupidity of the man who had asked him to secure for him a division of the inheritance with his brother, the Master places that trust in God which banishes all anxious thought from the mind and does each day's duties cheerfully, looking to the Hand that feeds the ravens and adorns the lily to supply that which is needful for the body. Here Jesus repeats some of the most striking sayings of the Sermon on the Mount, including the urgent exhortation to make the kingdom of God the first object of life, with the promise that all secondary blessings will then be added. He then assures the little flock that it is the Father's purpose to give them the kingdom, but that, in order to enjoy it to the full extent, they must empty their hearts of all worldly treasures. "Sell that ye have and give alms; make for yourselves purses which wax not old, a treasure in the heavens that faileth not, where no thief draweth near, neither moth destroyeth. For where your treasure is, there will your heart be." Such an unworldly life can be lived only by the exercise of the greatest vigilance and loyalty. The temptations to seek worldly wealth and pleasure are so many that the servant of God is constantly beset by them. He needs, therefore, to cultivate the habit of watchfulness, and the Savior enforced this by a series of illustrations taken from practical life. The first is that of a master who is in attendance upon a marriage feast, from which he is expected to return at any moment. He has instructed his servants to be ready to open the door for him when they hear his knock. The wise servant will not relax his vigilance, ungird his loins and lie down to sleep, but will keep himself girded and see that the lights in the house are kept burning. Then, when the master, approaching his home through the darkness, sees the welcome lights, and finds the faithful servants watching to open the door and minister to his comfort, his gratitude will be shown in the most generous way possible. He will make them sit down at the table, and he will gird himself and wait upon them, an honor great indeed in the eyes of an Oriental. The disciples must have recalled this language of Jesus when, some months later, in the upper room at Jerusalem, the Master actually girded himself and washed their feet, as the lowliest of servants might have done. Thus he alone, of all teachers who have sought to win the confidence and love of men, always practiced what he preached. Do not the faithful servants of our Lord Jesus always receive this generous recompense? No matter how diligent we are in ministering to our Lord, does he not bring to us in return far more than we give him? "Behold, I stand at the door and knock. If any man hear my voice and open the door I will come in to him, and will sup with him and he with Ah, dear Lord, what poor and meager fare thou hast, when thou dost sup with us! What have we to offer thee? Only our imperfect love, our wavering faith, our scanty righteousness, so like a torn and filthy garment. Yet, thou dost deign to feed on our crusts and hide the ugliness of our rags by the glory of thy presence. And, in return, we sup with thee! What nectar of love, what ambrosia of sweet confidence is this which fills our souls at thy banquet table! And the white robe of thy righteousness, how it makes us forget our shame and fills us with holy joy, that thou dost let us wear it with thee! How can men find it in their hearts to serve such a Lord?

*Lesson for September 23—Luke 12:36-46. Parallel passages—Matt. 24:42-51; Mark 13:34-37.

The second exhortation to watchfulness is taken from the example of a man whose house was broken into in the night by a robber. Had he known at what time the thief wou'd come he would not have slept, but would have been ready to expel him and save his goods. So the coming of Jesus will be at a time when the world is not looking for him, and it behooves the true disciple to be ever ready, that he be not surprised and unprepared. It is a significant fact that Jesus taught nothing definite as to the day of his coming. Sometimes he seems to tell us that it is in the immediate future. Again, he associates with it other facts that seem to demand a long delay on his part, a delay so protracted as to lead his followers into habits of carelessness. It is well that he has left us thus in uncertainty. That his coming will be sudden, and that without previous warning, is cause for the utmost diligence on our part. That he may not come for yet many years is reason why we should not sit idly down and wait to greet him, but busy ourselves with his service till we hear his approaching footstep.

And this leads to the third of these exquisite little parables of our Savior, in which he teaches how we may best be ready for his return. Peter had perhaps been restless under the searching words of Jesus, and felt that the implied possibility that the chosen disciples might prove faithless was hardly what their fidelity thus far merited. Poor fellow! he did not realize that one of them would betray Jesus into the hands of his enemies, and that he himself would deny that he knew him in an hour of cowardly panic. He asked the Savior, therefore: "Lord, speakest thou this parable unto us, or even to all?" How we would like to shift from our own shoulders these uncomfortable warnings and rebukes. "Lord, it is I?" we ask, hoping that his burning words are for others' unbelief and neglect, and not our own. But the kind Master will not deceive us by a false kindness. He makes us feel that the closer our kinship to him the greater the peril of neglect. He tells Peter that the steward, whose master has placed him in trust over the underservants, will be held to strict accountability. If he presumes upon his position to become an oppressor and a luxurious liver he shall feel upon him the heavy hand of his despised Lord. If the so-called "successor" of the Apostle Peter, the Pope of the Church of Rome, ever reads this passage of Scripture he must unless hardened by long-continued wrestling of the truth feel some twinges of conscience over the history and claims of the papacy. Its tyranny and luxury are faithfully pictured in this short parable of the Savior. It has presumed to set up and depose kings and emperors. It has changed laws without suffering the voice of the people to be heard. It has beaten and killed countless numbers of the servants of Jesus Christ, and has done its utmost to keep its subjects in ignorance of both human and divine knowledge. It is to day the sworn enemy of education and of civil and religious liberty, and the wrath of an of fended Lord will some day fall heavily upon it. In lesser degree the same warning is needful for every trusted servant in the kingdom of heaven. How many preachers have dishonored their holy calling by such a life as here pictured? And how often do elders and deacons, and others in high positions in the Church of God, make the heart of the Lord to bleed by their unholy behavior? Well may such dread the coming of the Lord Jesus Christ, for it can mean to them only a fearful accounting to him, and an awful recompense of judgment. To the faithful shepherds his coming will be joyful. "When the Chief Shepherd shall appear ye shall receive a crown of glory that fadeth not away."

The pest preparation for the coming of the Lord is to be busy in his service. The best way to be read for death, whether his coming be slow or sudd is to be living aright. John Knox visited the alof a poor laborer in his congregation, who was busy working that he did not know of the min ter's presence till he had stood for some time his side. Then he humbly spologized, in gra confusion, for his seeming lack of reverence; h the great preacher said: "Would that I might as busy when my Master comes." May you an be ever ready, by being ever engaged, loving and earnestly, in doing the Master's will.

TARES IN YOUR FIELD.

"A certain man;" how often that phrase occurs our Savior's words and how wide its applicaon! A certain man means you and me. A cerin man means all. So that this parable belongs us all. None but finds tares in his field of

New Year's day one makes his good resolves; on entering the church one has high ideas of hat his life is now going to be; or when one ins the Endeavor Society and takes the pledge; when one returns from a great convention led with enthusiasm and determination; or when he protracted meeting is over and one feels that is backbone is stiffened for right living these any days-all this is the sowing of the wheat! But "while he slept!" O, what things happen hile men sleep! We must sleep; we are weak nd finite and so need the rest and recuperation. ut there is a sense in which we should never leep, and certainly there is a time when we ould be ever awake.

We should never sleep in the sense that we hould never be off our guard. "Let him that hinketh he standeth take heed lest he fall!" It vill never do to feel a sense of security in our ighteousness or goodness. It is like feeling a ense of security in walking on smooth ice, or kating over thin ice. To be confident of our ecurity in this world of ours is like overconid-nce on the part of an army in an enemy's country in that we are likely to feel the sharp ire of temptation at any time.

And certainly there is a time when we should not slumber. It is just after the sowing of the wheat. As soon as the seed is in the ground, the noment that the glad process is over, comes the time of trial, the reaction follows naturally and temptation comes slyly, and unless resisted sows ts tares. In our great cities, to use another illustration, there is the most danger when one fails to lock his doors and be prepared for the thief in the night. On the river or the sea, in boats, the smoothest, most placid weather is the time when all things need to be ready for the

And so the heart of the parable is, in time of security look out for danger! Keep the heart carefully, for out of it are the issues of life. In It grow good thoughts like mignonette in a garden-for sweetness of perfume; and in it grow evil thoughts, which quickly become evil deeds, and are like noxious weeds for ill odor.

Thoughts, then, are tares, evil thoughts; for never was there an evil deed which did not first come into the brain in the shape of thought. How obvious, then, the lesson of the parable: that our thoughts should be upon high things. soever things are lovely, think on these things! When the brain becomes idle it is ours to bestir ourselves with energy and find some beautiful book or picture or recreation that shall fill our minds with things worth thinking about.

Instruction in Photography. By Sir William Dew. Abney. Lippincott, Philadelphia. Tenth edition.

Among the many manuals of instruction in photography, we know of none more comprehensive than this, or which has more successfully stood the test of time and use. It is a book for the ad vanced photographer, or for the one who is ambitious to do something more intelligent than to "press the button" and let somebody else do the rest. In addition to the usual practical directions for the various branches of photographic manipulation, it embraces a thorough treatise on photographic chemistry, which, to be sure, is not arranged so as to be easily intelligible to one completely ignorant of general chemistry, but which will be of great value to any intelligent photographer. There are also chapters on such subjects as the making of lantern slides and enlargements, color photography, platinum and carbon prints, photo-lithegraphy and half-tone processes.

MODERN ITALY. By Piedro Orsi. Translated by Mary Alice Vialls. G. P. Putnam's Sons, New York.

The author of this work, who is a distinguished professor of history in Venice, has set himself the interesting task of describing the c urse of the development of Italy from 1748 to 1888. This period of a century and a half carried Italy from a state but slightly removed from medievalism, divided, degraded and depressed, to the condition of a modern European power and a worthy member of the family of nations. Few countries have passed through more rapid and significent transitions than those which mark the history of Italy from the days of the Bourbon kings of Naples to the reign of Humbert. The effect of the French revolution in Italy, the Napoleonic regime, the period of Austrian domination after the Congress of Vienna, the revolution, unification and the loss of the temporal power of the Pope-all these form the elements of a most interesting piece of history and one which is well treated in this volume.

POPULAR CONCEPTIONS AS TO CHRISTIAN FAITH AND LIFE. By Rev. Frank T. Lee. Boston and Chicago. The Pilgrim Press.

This volume of 261 pages is divided into three books. Book I is on the subject of Faith and contains three chapters as follows: "As to the Christian Basis of Faith," "As to the Bible," "As to the Interpretation of the Scriptures." Book II is on Life and contains chapters on misconceptions: "As to Sanctification or Perfection," "As to Experience as a Test of the Reality of Divine Grace." "As to Things Specially Needed in Christian Life and Character in These Times," "As to the Sources of Christian Contentment." Book III treats of Service under the following chapters: "As to the Duty of Public Confession of Christ," "As to What Constitutes a Successful Church," "As to the kind of Preaching Needed in Our Age," "As to Foreign Missions." Book IV is on the Divine Source, and contains a single chapter entitled, "As to the Nature and Work of the Holy Spirit."

This book not only points out, as its name indicates, the misconceptions on the various topics treated, but treats these subjects also in a positive way, setting forth what the author believes to be the true position. It is not a profound treatise, and is all the more valuable, perhaps, for that fact. It strikes the level of the average intelligence and Christian experience. There is nothing in it that the average reader will not readily apprehend. The style is clear and perspicuous. The teaching seems to us to be marked by great sanity and common sense. It

WAR IN CHINA!!!

The great insurrection in the Chinese Empire, which threatens to involve the United States and the other great nations of the world, has naturally aroused an increased interest in the "Flowery Kingdom." The American people want to know more of the situation in the Orient, and are eagerly looking for literature on the subject.

FACTS ABOUT CHINA.

We recently published a booklet, entitled "Facts About China," by Wm. Remfrey Hunt, of Cheo, China. Mr. Hunt has been for many years a resident of Central China, and is thoroughly acquainted with the country and its people. The following are some of his topics:

Vastness of Chinese Empire, History and Age of China, The People of China, Populousness of China, Climate and Products, Classic and Sacred Systems, Strange Manners and Customs, Some Absurdities of Heathenism, Lauguage, Education and Literature, Missions in China.

"Facts About China" is concisely and tersely written. The purpose of the author is to convey information and to instruct and not to entertain or amuse. Nevertheless, the book is thoroughly interesting. A map of the Chinese Empire is included in the book.

helps to solve many a problem that no doubt puzzles many a layman in the church. It does not strive after high and difficult things, but removes stumblingblocks out of the way of the ordinary wayfaring man. Churches and church members accepting the teaching of the book and being guided by it would be vastly more Christian for doing so. There is only one or two points on which we would take issue with the author, and considering the number of the problems treated there is so much more to commend than to find fault with that we take pleasure in commending the book as a whole to the reading public.

A BRIEF HISTORY OF EASTERN ASIA. By I. C. Hannah. T. Fisher Unwin, London.

With the thoughts of all mankind turned toward the Chinese Empire this book on the history of Eastern Asia will have a peculiar attraction for those who desire more than a superficial acquaintance with the situation. Beginning with the earliest times-in fact, the author starts with the Tertiary Epoch-the author traces the history of India, China and Japan down to the present time. The continuity of the narrative suffers somewhat from the fact that the history of India has no close connection with that of the more eastern part of the continent. The book is full of unfamiliar names and details, many of which we are tempted to call inconsequential; but, to be sure, nothing is inconsequential to the pains-taking historian. That part of the work which deals with the present Eastern Question, as involving the European Powers, is brief and clear, but not profound.

A CRITICAL CRITICIZER CRITICIZED; or, Ingersoll's Gospel Analyzed. By Page A. Cochran. St. Albans, Vermont. Paper, 50 cents.

If one were disposed to criticize this cricicism of the "Critical Criticizer" it might be suggested that Ingersoll's method had nothing critical about it. He was not, in any modern acceptation of the term, a critical criticizer of Christianity. His type of infidelity was the grossest sort and the one least likely to be a permanent menace to religion. Nevertheless, it has some force with a certain low type of mind, and there should always be available such answers to it as are contained in this convenient volume. The author performs his task quite thoroughly and his analysis of the famous infidel's position is sufficient to show their weakness. As a piece of literature the book would perhaps be open to criticism. The author gives an illustration of mixed metaphor which might become classic when he says that he expects some "to hurl their icy bombshells and lethean doses of anæsthetic powders into the arena to dampen and chill the ardor of many who will read and digest." Indeed, it is a fearsome thing to be chilled by a dose of anæsthetic powder, especially if the lethean drug be administered by the somewhat novel method of hurling it into an arena; and as for icy bombshells, though they might not be destructive in the manner which is usual for bombshells, what could be more effecttually dampening on a warm day?

Iow One Preacher Spent His Vacation.

I believe in preachers -as well as other peopleking a vacation. If some good brother facetiousremarks, as he reads of the summer hegira of ne preachers: "The devil never takes a vacation." would say: "Well, that's one difference, at least, etween His Satanic Majesty and myself-I do." have just closed a two months' vacation and feel freshed and strengthened and have girded on ne armor for a vigorous campaign during the fall nd winter. But I have not been out of town! I ave filled the pulpit regularly, morning and evenng! This is the way I did it: The last Sunday iu une I said to the dear brrethren that during uly and August I would only do such visiting as absolutely necessary I intended taking a vadaion of two months. I would be found at home henever especially needed, and I would be in my lace each Lord's day, otherwise I was going to est. The silence of the congregation I took for

Now, we live in a very comfortable house situaed upon a lot about 100 by 200 feet. All around re large fruit and shade trees, and with delightul southern exposure we get the finest Kansas ephyrs blowing! Upon the large porch at the outh front of the house I made myself comfortale with easy chairs, rugs, tables loaded with eautiful flowers, and with some new books proeeded to take my vacation. It was magnificent. t was restful. It was valuable. I have read uch books as "Characteristics of the Chinese," by Dr. Smith. "China and the Chinese," by Dr. Nev-us. "Some Latter-Day Religions," by my good friend, George Hamilton Combs. "A Man's Value to Society, by Dr. Hillis, "The Apostolic Age," by McGiffert, etc. Of course, it was risky to read 'The Apostolic Age" during dog days, but I accomplished the feat without going mad. Besides these books I read the current numbers of the Literary Digest, the Self Culture Magazine, the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST, the Christian Standard and the Central Christian Register. How I have enjoyed this rest and this reading and study! Best of all, our church has kept up all its services and the audiences have been very large, those on Sunday evenings frequently being too large to be accommodated in our building after crowding from six to eight hundred into it, people being turned away on more than one occasion. During the two months fourteen persons were received into our fellowship, just half of whom were baptized.

My work as chaplain of the Kansas Soldiers' Orphans' Home continued right along, with shortened preaching services for the children on Sunday afternoons. So, this has been my vacation. Ye metropolitan pastors, who must go miles and miles away from home to recuperate, by sea, or lakeside, or in the mountains, don't you envy me? My family has been so well, the children reveling on our beautiful lawn; we have avoided packing and unpacking trunks; have not been worried about making railway and steamer connections; have had no mosquitoes to fight; have gotten our meals when and of what character we needed, and the hundred or two dollars it would have required for us to go even a little way from home we may add to our bank account! Please don't anybody apply for this pastorate. You can't have it!

CARITHERS.

Mrs. Lena L. Caruthers passed into perfect life at Alpine, Texas, July 9, 1900. Born in Bluffton, Ind., November 3, 1861. The subject of this sketch united with the Christian Church at the early age of 14 years. With her father, Rev. N. Van Horn, of Ft. Worth, and her sainted mother, who passed into rest some years ago, she came to Texas, and there met and married him with whom her happiest days were spent. A husband and seven children survive to mourn her loss. Yet, "Blessed are the dead which die in the Lord . . . for their works do follow them." It was "a voice from heaven" that uttered this tender thought and spoke these words of balm and consolation. Lest we forget it is well for us to keep in mind that long after the spirit has fled the influence of a sweet Christian life remains with its fragrant memories to bless and sanctify. "Born"—"Died" are too often the termini of a vain, useless, purposeless life, but it was not so with the subject of this sketch. The years of her life that stretch between the coming and going, the entrance and the exit, the breaking of early dawn and the fading light of parting day, have been filled with good works and kindly deeds. Her lovely Christian character shone like a star. The warm sympathies of her heart, the ministrations of her hands, made her loved by all. Her life was short, and in the rich fullness of a perfect womanhood, in the peace and plenty of a loving home, the end came. Not swiftly and unseen, like a danger in the night, but slowly, lingeringly, as though death itself halted and hesitated to demand its due. Unflinchingly, uncomplainingly, she faced the end, sustained by that faith which falters not and kn ws no doubt nor fear. She is gone, but we thank God that her memory fragrent as a flower is with ye yet. memory, fragrant as a flower, is with us yet. Her husband mourns the loss of loving companionship. the children miss her tender care, relatives and friends the gentle deeds which were her daily duties; and yet it is hopeless, selfish sorrow. Some-where, sometime, in God's appointed way, we shall meet again, and in this hope we rejoice.

FORD.

Tirey Ford, born January 21, 1818, died near Granville, Mo., August 28, 1900; aged 82 years, seven months and seven days. Bro. Ford was mar-ried to the faithful wife who survives him, May 10, ried to the faithful wife who survives him, May 10, 1845, having enjoyed at his departure, a happy companionship of 55 years. He left also two sons, one daughter and one brother to mourn his departure. Bro. Ford united with the Christian Church 60 years ago and lived a very devoted Christian life. Much of that time he was an officer in the church. He was a very intellectual man and always kept well informed on the current events of the world. He was a man of deep continuous and lived with a conscience wid of offense victions and lived with a conscience void of offense toward God and man, and was respected by all. C. H. STRAWM.

HAYES.

Friday morning, August 31, the spirit of Mrs. Nrncy Hayes passed to her reward. She was past her 99th birthday, and in a few months would have reached the century mark. For 76 years she has been a Disciple of Christ. She united with those who plead for primative Christianity, when the movement was yet young, and has lived to see a mighty progress. For 52 years she had lived near movement was yet yours, mighty progress. For 52 years she had lived near this place. Her life was active, and as she had lived the many years with strong faith in Christ, she died in the hope of the resurrection. The funeral was conducted from her home by the J. R. GOLDEN.

MERITT.

It is my sad duty to chronicle the death of Thomas M. Meritt, who died on the 20th inst. He been a member of the Church of Christ in Middletown for 40 years, and for many years had been one of the elders. We will all miss Uncle Tommy. He leaves his aged companion and four children and a host of friends to mourn his departure.

J. J. LOCKHART.

MCCALLISTER.

Died, Francis C. McCallister, at the home of his son, in Rockwell City, Ia., August 24, 1900, at the age of 76 years and six months. He was born in Warren County, O., in 1824. United with the Christian Church is 1854, and continued faithful to the end. Was a member of Company G. 4th Iowa infantry, an ideal soldier, and returned home with an honorable discharge. Rockwell City had no more honorable and respected citizen than he. Funeral conducted by the writer, August 26.
The remains were laid by the side of his wife in the Loherville Cemetery. E. M. MILLER.

NEWHOUSE

Catherine, wife of Anthony Newhouse, for 40 years a member of the New Baltimore Church of Christ, died Aug. 24, at the age of 73.—F. M.

J. H. Wilson, of Van Alstyne, Texas, fell asleep at Green Grove, Ky., August 24, 1900; age, 29 years. He was a self-made man of great college acquirements. In the bloom of manhood he re-solved to spend his talents in the service of the Master; accordingly, he began preparation by entering the School of the Evangelists where he had bright hopes of completing the course. Through vacation he had been doing evangelistic work in Tennessee and Kentucky until he was called home. He was an accommodating, brotherly and ideal young minister, who believed in world-wide Christianity on the promises. Asking but little pay for his services he proved himself willing to carry the old Jerusalem gospel to the needy and was apostolic in zeal, and Christlike in ways.

Odd Fellows' Day.

The good people of Greeley, Ia., and vicinity enjoyed a unique service to which Odd Fellows and Rebekahs were specially invited. The meeting was held in a beautiful shady grove on our own premises at 10:30 A. M. and at 2:30 P. M. It was a union meeting, the Methodist brethren joining us in the service, the pastor preaching the afternoon sermon. The morning sermon was by the writer from the single word "foundations" (Ps. 11:3).

These services were largely attended, quite a number coming from the county seat and other neighboring towns. It is said to have been the largest meeting held in the quiet little town of Greeley for a number of years. The Odd Fellows and Rebekahs marched from their hall, headed by the Manchester Canton in full uniform. never addressed a more orderly and attentive au-dience. Everything went off pleasantly, and we have reason to believe that good was accomplished. Many were heard to express the hope that such occasions may be more frequent in the future.

People attend these services who had seldom if ever attended the regular services of the church. We hope much good may result to the Master's D. H. BAYS.

Book Notes.

We are hard at work on our new General Cata logue, which will probably be issued about October 1. This catalogue will contain descriptive price list of all books, pamphlets, church, Sunday-school and Christian Endeavor supplies, etc., supplied by us. It will be profusely illustrated and handsomer than any catalogue we have ever issued. Prices will run much lower than ever before. Of course, you will want a copy, and if you would have an early copy, drop us a postal card now, and a copy will be mailed you, free, as soon as issued.

"The Dawn of the Reformation in Missouri" is a book that ought to be eagerly bought by our Missouri preachers and members. It is a volume of 589 pages, well bound in cloth, which formerly sold for $2.00, but which we are now offering for Ninety Cents. It is a very thorough history of the beginnings and early progress of our cause in Missouri, with sketches of the pioneers. The author, T. P. Haley, has been from early boyhood a Missouri preacher, and probably no man has had a more intimate acquaintance with our cause in the Rome will bear watching at all times, and especially those times just preceding elections. This is election year. The campaign is on. Rome is working-more quietly than usual, perhaps, but undoubtedly working-for its selfish interests and against Americanism. Does any man doubt the cesseless efforts of Rome to undermine American institutions and to neutralize the progress of civilization? Let him secure and read that splendid volume, "America or Rome: Christ or the Pope," by J. L. Brandt. It is an eye-opener! It is a handsome volume of 526 pages, illustrated with 55 engravings. It treats of Romanism in all its phases, but gives especial attention to political Romanism. We send it to any address, postpaid, for $1.50.

On page 2 of this issue will be found some offers of desirable volumes at very attractive prices. We want our patrons to understand that these offers will not always stand. Next year, or even next month, may be too late. Many of these books are books that every reader of this paper should have, and they will never be sold cheaper than at the present time.

We wish to again call attention to our "Special Bagster Teachers' Bible"-the biggest Bible bargain ever offered. This is not one of those cheap editions of the Scriptures gotten up to look well when new and to sell well at a low figure. This edition was published to sell at $5.00. It is bound in Syrian Levant (real leather), is full leatherlined (real leather, not paper imitation,), round corners, silk sewed, red under gold edges, printed on fine paper. We offer it for TWO DOLLARS, postpaid. We say again that this is the greatest Bible bargain ever offered. We could not buy ten thousand copies, wholesale, at this rate, nor anywhere near it. If you wish one of these Bibles, order it NOW.

CURRENT EVENTS.

Mr. Bryan's letter of acceptance, which dated Sept. 17th, begins with the reitertion of the pledge which he gave in his ormer letter of acceptance four years ago, hat he will in no case accept a second erm of the presidential office. In the presnt document he passes over those issues hich he treated in his notification speech, iz., imperialism, militarism and the Boer ar, and devotes himself to the remaining lanks. He favors the enforcement of exting laws against trusts, additional legisation to dissolve every private monopoly which does business outside of its own tate, and, if necessary, a constitutional mendment empowering Congress to legisate effectively against injurious combinaions. The evil of corporations entering he field of politics is pointed out. The ecessity of enlarging the scope of the inerstate commission is emphasized. There no space, of course, in a letter of aceptance for a real argument of the curreny question, but Mr. Bryan lays sufficient mphasis on it to indicate that, whatever he gold Democrats may think, he does not onsider it a worn-out issue. The other lanks of the Democratic platform are touched upon briefly by way of asserting his hearty endorsement of them. He expresses himself in favor of admitting to statehood the territories of Arizona, New Mexico and Oklahoma. The letter closes with a renewed assertion of the paramountcy and immediacy of the issue of imperialism.

Mr. Roosevelt's letter accepting the nomination for Vice-President is eloquent with the distinctively Rooseveltian type of eloquence. He points out, for the benefit of men like Mr. Schurz, that if the Democracy is sincere in its declaration in favor of free silver it is dangerous, and if it is insincere it is unworthy of confidence. Referring to the question of trusts, he urges the necessity of controlling those which work injury, and of discriminating between objectionable combinations of capital and those which are innocent and necessary. In any case the first requirement is an accurate knowledge of the facts. A campaign against trusts must be a campaign of education, not of denunciation. Militarism, says Mr. Roosevelt, is not a danger which threatens us if the policy of the present administration is carried out. The only course which would lead us into that danger would be such as Mr. Bryan proposes, namely, an attempt to prevent foreign interference with an absolutely independent government by the Filipinos.

New York politics is not conspicuous for its immaculateness, but as a rule its own leaders of both parties maintain some sort of pretense of popular government at least. It is reported through Republican sources that a "deal" has been effected between Platt and Croker whereby New York is to go Republican in the national election. Of course, this may or may not be true, but it is plausible enough. A prominent New York Republican in commenting on the situation naively remarked: "You know we don't have elections in New York, we have deals; and this time the deal has gone against the Democrats."

The postponed strike of the coal miners in the anthracite region of Pennsylvania began on Monday of this week. About 112,000 miners in all have quit. In districts number one and number three the tie-up is practically complete, and in district number seven about 10,000 miners have struck. Statements differ as to the preparedness of the union to maintain a long strike. The representatives of the miners say they can hold out longer than the operators can. The latter say they can hold out for six months, while the union has not enough money to give a single payment of fifty cents to each striker. It is certain at least that no union can support so vast a number of unemployed men very long, and few of the men have had any opportunity to save money for this emergency. If they had, they would not be on a strike. A strong statement of grievances has been issued by Mr. Mitchell, president of the union, which has not been answered by the operators, except in terms of general denial. There are two facts at least which cannot be denied: the wages of the miners have not been increased in the last two or three years; and the price of coal to the consumer has been materially increased within that period.

The situation in China continues enigmatical. We are informed daily through the press that the Powers have agreed to withdraw all troops from Pekin to Tien-Tsin, and also that the Powers have agreed not to withdraw troops from Pekin until a satisfactory reply has been made by the Chinese government to the Russian ultima-The fact that Russia has issued an ultimatum looks, on the face of it, like a recession from her declared intention of withdrawing unconditionally. Russia demands three things: first, that the Emperor resume control of the government; second, that Prince Tuan, the leader of the Boxers, be arrested and punished; and third, that the Empress be excluded from all participation in governmental affairs. Li Hung Chang is said to object to these demands, except the first. Apparently there is some sort of an understanding between Russia and France in regard to withdrawing their legations from Pekin, even if troops are not withdrawn. The ministers have not been willing to recognize Prince Ching as authorized to treat for peace, and negotiations have, therefore, been delayed, pending the arrival of Li Hung Chang at As soon as definite negotiations Pekin. begin, the question of indemnity will arise. Certainly China should be compelled to pay indemnity for the property that has been destroyed and for the expense which has been incurred by the several Powers in granting their citizens the protection which the Chinese government ought to have provided. But China has no money wherewith to pay a cash indemnity. She is already burdened with an immense debt to Japan, resulting from her last war, and her customs are pledged to the farthest limit. She is, in fact, tottering on the verge of insolvency. Will it be a land indemnity? And if so, will this be but a step toward the ultimate partition of China among the Powers? These questions will begin to be answered when peace negotiations are commenced.

The war in South Africa has at last apparently reached its final stage. It has been almost over for a long while, but it may now be said with substantial accuracy that it is over. Captain Reichman, of the United States army, who has been observing the operations as a military expert, says that it is done and he is coming home. President Kruger has withdrawn to Lorenzo Marquez and has resigned the presidency. General Botha is making overtures for surrender. No one can say, of course, how long the Boers would be able to maintain a more or less formidable guerrilla warfare, but it is obvious that they have nothing to gain by such a course, and that the pursuance of a policy which would continue the horrors of war without leading to any possible advantageous result, would lose for them much sympathy.

Later reports from Galveston prove that the destruction of life and property there was even greater than the first hasty estimates indicated. It will be long before the exact number of fatalities can be known. Perhaps it can never be known, but it appears at present that the number will be between 5,000 and 6,000. The papers are beginning to contain accounts by eye-witnesses full of ghastly picturesqueness. A calamity such as this brings out both the best and worst in human nature. The looting of the ruins and robbing of the dead which has been practiced exhibits a degree of brutality of which it is difficult to conceive. The swift and severe punishment which has been dealt to the culprits is well deserved. On the other hand, the sympathy of the nation, which has been expressed, not only in words of regret, but in contributions of cash, gives evidence that the brotherhood of man is not an idle dream or a foolish fancy. New York has within a week sent more than a hundred thousand dollars, Chicago more than sixty thousand, and St. Louis nearly the same amount. The authorities, both city and state, have acted with most praiseworthy promptness and efficiency in repressing lawlessness and organizing relief forces. Much larger contributions are still needed to carry on the work. More than two million dollars were given for the relief of the Johnstown sufferers, and the Galveston calamity is of much greater magnitude.

Count Tolstoy has long enjoyed the remarkable privilege of living undisturbed in Russia and saying about what he pleased in regard to church and state. The civil authorities respect him in spite of his revolutionary theories, and allow him to go his way without interference. Perhaps it is the moral earnestness and complete unself-ishness of his character which command respect; or perhaps they do not take him very seriously. At any rate, he has steadily enjoyed imperial favor to a degree which is surprising, considering his views about emperors and armies and his free expression of them. But his last book, "Resurrection," has gotten him into trouble with the church. Of late years Tolstoy's chief function has been to exhibit the hollowness and hypocrisy of this, that and the other institution of modern life. Almost everything that is established, that has acquired the force of a fixed custom, has come in for a share of his denunciation. One is inclined to lose patience, after a while, with a criticism of life and society which proceeds upon the apparent assumption that whatever is, is wrong; and this, too, although one may fully appreciate the moral purpose which actuates the old reformer and the rugged sublimity of his own character. In "Resurrection" he has devoted himself rather more than he ever did before to exhibiting the worthlessness of the Russian Church, which is busied, according to him, with distributing to the people the "husks of religion," and he characterizes the clergy as "blind leaders of the blind." Any one who has ever listened to a Russian service will see that when he describes it as "meaningless much-speaking," the shot goes square to the mark and deep enough to hurt. As the result of all this, the ecclesiastical authorities in Russia have decided to cast out the offender from their midst. Overruling the purpose of the three metropolitans to proclaim publicly his apostasy, the synod has quietly issued orders to the priests to refuse him the sacraments and the other privileges of church membership. When he dies, his body cannot be buried in consecrated ground. Probably Tolstoy will not grieve greatly over the results of his exclusion from the church. The surprising thing is that he should have waited to be put out.

Those who are seeking information as to the actual policy of the administration toward the Philippines, cannot find it better expressed than in the letter of instructions which the President sent to the second Philippine commission at the time when it began its work. This document was not prepared for campaign use, but for the private instruction of the men who were appointed to organize a civil government in the archipelago, and it has only recently been made public. The declarations of a party platform must be interpreted in the light of their purpose, viz., the winning of votes, but this document had no purpose other than the instruction of the commissioners. We quote some extracts from it, indicating the administration's attitude in regard to the self-government of the Filipinos. "As long as the insurrection continues, the military arm must necessarily be supreme. But there is no reason why steps should not be taken from time time to inaugurate governments essentially popular in their form as fast as the territory is held and controlled by our troops. . . . They (the commissioners) should in general be enjoined, after making themselves familiar with the conditions and needs of the country, to devote their attention in the first instance to the establishment of mur cipal government in which the natives the islands, both in the cities and in the rural communities, shall be afforded to opportunity to manage their own loc affairs to the fullest extent of which the are capable, and subject to the least degree of supervision and control which a caref study of their capacities and observation of the workings of native control show be consistent with the maintenance of la order and loyalty. The next subject order of importance should be the organization tion of government in the larger admini trative divisions corresponding to countie departments or provinces, in which the common interests of many or several mur cipalities, falling within the same trib lines, or the same natural geographical limit may best be subserved by a common admi istration. Whenever the commission is the opinion that the condition of affairs the islands is such that the central admini tration may safely be transferred fro military to civil control, they will repo that conclusion to you, with their recon mendations as to the form of centr government to be established for the pu pose of taking over the control."

In regard to the relation between the m nicipal and provincial governments, the le ter of instruction says: "In the distribution of powers among the governments orga ized by the commission, the presumption always to be in favor of the smaller subd vision [i. e., the one which, as above state shall be first placed in the hands of the n tives], so that all the powers which ca properly be exercised by the municipal go ernment shall be vested in that governmen and all the powers of a more general cha acter which can be exercised by the depart mental government shall be vested in the government, and so that in the govermental system, which is the result of th process, the central government of the i lands, following the example of the distr bution of the powers between the states an the national government of the Unite States, shall have no direct administration except of matters of purely general co cern, and shall have only such supervision and control over local governments as ma be necessary to secure and enforce faithf and efficient administration by local officer In all cases the municipal office who administer the local affairs of the pe ple are to be selected by the people and wherever officers of more extended jurisdiction are to be selected in any wa natives of the island are to be preferre and if they can be found competent as willing to perform the duties, they are receive the offices in preference to an others."

A St. Louis paper says that if a man he paid his taxes, registered for the comir election, subscribed to the World's Fair fur (Louisiana Purchase Centennial) and sent contribution to Galveston, he may look to world in the eye and consider himself good citizen.

RESTORATION AND PROGRESS IN RELIGION.

The key word or at least one of the key words in our religious movement is restoration, and that has proved a stumblingblock in the way of many people. When we plead for a return to the simple religion of Christ, and the restoration of those features of evangelism and of church organization which characterized the church in the beginning, we are confronted with the objection that this is going backward instead of forward. It is said, too, by some of our critics, that in our opposition to existing creeds, and in our plea for the sufficiency of the Holy Scriptures, we are ignoring the results of the Christian thinking of past centuries, and count as naught all the efforts of Christian scholars to put into systematic and consistent form the facts, truths and doctrines of the Bible. In a word, there seems to be in their minds, an essential antagonism between restoration, which may be said to be one of the key words of our reformation, and that other key word of our modern life, namely, progress. How can they be reconciled?

The antagonism here is only apparent, not real. A little reflection and clear thinking will show that both these words, and the thoughts for which they stand, are essential to every religious reformation. In every real religious reformation there must be a return to original sources, original facts and original principles. This was true in Old Testament history, and it has been true throughout the Christian dispensation, and must remain eternally true. Christianity is an historical religion. It can be traced. as other great movements, to its historic source It had its origin in the life and teaching of a supreme personality, Jesus the Christ, and in certain great facts associated with him. It goes without saying that those causes which produced Christianity in the beginning are alone adequate to carry it on to ultimate triumph. To the extent that the church in any age loses its hold on the person of Christ, or departs from those fundamental principles which he taught, it ceases to be his church, and becomes something else, and that something else a waning force in the world. It is the claim of every reformer that there have been such departures from the original sources of power and success. To the extent that this is true, it is evident that restoration has not only a legitimate but an essential place in any adequate reform.

In our own religious movement it is claimed that the original, simple and yet comprehensive confession of faith, on which Christ said he would build his church, namely, the Messiahship and deity of Jesus of Nazareth, has been practically displaced by elaborate formulations of doctrine, more or less speculative, which have been made the foundations of denominational churches, and the bases of denominational fellowship. It is claimed, too, that this departure from the original foundation, other than which no man can lay, has reulted in divisions among the people of God, and that a restoration of the original foundation of the church is essential to the restoration of its lost unity. This fact is now quite generally admitted, all recognizing the impracticability of effecting the unity of believers on any human creed. It is further claimed, by the advocates of this Reformation, that there has been a no less obvious departure in the modern church from the simple, straightforward, rational method of evangelization practiced by the apostles, and by the first preachers, and that it is necessary, in order to attain to that effectiveness in evangelistic work which marked the first century of the church, to restore the apostolic method of preaching the gospel, and of winning men to the acknowledgment of Christ and to the Christian life. Not to mention other features of original Christianity that need to be restored, these will suffice to show that restoration has its essential place in religious reformation.

But is this idea of restoration inconsistent with progress? That depends upon what we mean by progress. It is certainly not inconsistent with growth in Christian knowledge, and in the application of Christian principles to all the phases and problems of human life. Indeed, if it be true that Christianity derives its vitality and power from Christ, and that a condition of receiving this vitality and power in any age is loyalty to Christ and to his fundamental teaching, then restoration is not only consistent with progress, but is an essential condition of true progress, whenever there has been a departure from what is clearly Christ's will and doctrine. When a traveler, having a certain destination, has taken a road which is leading him in the wrong direction, it is an essential condition of his making progress in the right direction, that he go back and get on the right road. But the question again occurs, in doing this, are we throwing overboard the results of all the religious thinking of past centuries? By no means. We are simply returning to the norm or standard of all truth, by which we may test this religious thinking, and appropriate so much of it as may be consistent with the doctrine of Christ and his apostles, and reject the remainder.

The apparent antagonism between the idea of restoration and progress grows out of the failure to discriminate between those fundamental facts of the gospel which are to be believed, the divine requirements which are to be obeyed, and the efforts of the human mind in deducing from these fundamental facts, truths and commands, a system of doctrine. The first is divine, and to be accepted by faith; the latter is a human product, subject to change with advancing knowledge, experience and culture. It is natural and right that the human mind should seek to formulate its knowledge of divine things in some sort of system; and this is theology. Much progress has been made in arriving at a satisfactory statement of these great problems of doctrine, duty and destiny. The Christian believers of to-day are the inheritors of whatever truth has been developed by all the past centuries of investigation. They are only prevented from availing themselves of such truth by the limitations of their creed, their mental incapacity or their unwillingness to receive truth.

We may reject all human creeds as possessing any authority over the conscience, or as forming the basis of Christian fellowship, without rejecting any truth there is in them. To say nothing of the mixture of truth and error which they contain, it is not necessary that all our theories, speculations and philosophies, even if they be true, should enter into the creed of the church or into its basis of fellowship. This is the ground on which we, who plead for the restoration of the Christianity of the New Testament, repudiate human creeds. accept whatever truth there is in them tentatively, so far as it commends itself to us, but we deny the right of any body of men to make a new basis of Christian fellowship, and to lay another and new foundation for the church. We believe in restoring the original foundation, and then going on with the building. Herein is restoration, and herein, also, is progress, and whoever loses sight of one or the other has lost one of the essential elements of religious reformation.

OBEDIENCE THE TEST OF FAITH.

(John 14:21-24; 1 John 5:1-3.)

[Uniform Midweek Prayer-meeting Topic, Sept. 26,]

CENTRAL TRUTH: Obedience is more than a test of faith; it is faith itself in action; it is faith embodied in deeds.

It is a significant fact that the two passages cited for this lesson, teaching the relation of obedience to faith, are taken from the apostle of love. With John obedience was faith and disobedience was unbelief. Love is the inspiring motive that lies behind all acceptable obedience. It is not strange, therefore, that the apostle who has said so much about love should always emphasize obedience as the very heart of faith.

The words quoted from John, however, are the words of the Master Himself. He has given us a rule by which we may know infallibly whether or not we love Christ: "He that hath my commandments and keepeth them, he it is that loveth me." There is no metaphysics about this; it is a plain, practical rule of conduct and character. Any one who flatters himself that he loves Christ and yet trifles with any of Christ's commandments, refusing or delaying obedience, is simply deceived, according to the Master Himself. Obedience is the natural expression of a genuine love for Christ, and communion with the Father and the Son is conditioned upon this loving obedience to Christ's commandments.

Judas (not Iscariot) asked a question which has probably occurred to others: "Lord, what is come to pass that thou wilt manifest thyself unto us and not unto the world?"

Hitherto Jesus had manifested Himself openly and to all the people. The question of Judas was how and why this change, so that Jesus would hereafter manifest Himself only to His disciples. The answer of Jesus was: "If a man love me, he will keep my word; and my Father will love him, and we will come unto him and make our abode with him. He that loveth me not keepeth not my words; and the word which ye hear is not mine, but the Father's who sent me."

Here, then, is the great fundamental distinction, loving and obeying, not loving and not obeying. This it is that divides human beings into two classes. To the first class Jesus promises that He and the Father would manifest themselves and would hold communion with them. This spiritual communion with God is the privilege alone of those who love Christ and keep His words. And let it be remembered that these words refer, not simply to the primal confession of our faith and to baptism, but to our daily living; to the tone and temper of our speech; to the purity of our thought, and to the thousand choices that make up conduct and character.

The same relation is declared by John in his first epistle as cited above. The believer in Jesus Christ is begotten of God, and if he is begotten of God, he not only loves God, but loves all that are begotten of God. Here faith in Jesus issues in loving obedience to God: "For this is the love of God, that we keep his commandments." Nothing else, in John's estimation, is worthy to be called love.

But this love which obeys, according to John's thought, roots itself in that faith which has Jesus Christ for its object: "And this is the victory that hath overcome the world, even our faith." The faith that lavs hold of Jesus Christ, that unites the soul to Him in loving obedience, that establishes communion between the soul and God-this is the faith that overcomes the world. No other faith than this has any promise of justification, or of eternal life. On no other faith is salvation predicated in the New Testament. Let us, then, submit our faith to this supreme test, and see whether or not we are standing where we can claim the divine promises.

PRAYER.

O Thou gracious and divine Father, we thank Thee that Thou hast so revealed Thyself to us in Jesus Christ that we may love Thee with our whole hearts, and love Him whom Thou hast sent to be our Savior. We thank Thee that Thou hast made it easy for us to believe in Thy Son, and that believing in Him and loving Him, it is a delight to walk in obedience to His commandments, which are not grievous. We thank Thee for the promise of fellowship with Thee and Thy Son, and we beseech Thee that henceforth our lives may be in harmony with Thy will, that this communion with Thee may be a source of unfailing joy and strength. And so living and serving Thee here, may it be ours to share the everlasting joys of communion with Thee in the world to come. In Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen!

The first breeze that has in it a suspicion of autumn is blowing to-day. It is a delightful change from the hot, sultry weather of the past few weeks, but it reminds us that the summer is past and that autumn is upon us. It has already brought visions of shocks of corn, of yellow pumpkins on the frostbitten vines, of piles of apples under the trees, of "wailing winds and naked woods," and the sound of falling nuts. Or, turning to the city for signs of autumn, we find them in the great coal wagons unloading their carbon treasures on the sidewalks, the flocking homeward of the summer tourists, increased attendance at church and less travel on street car lines leading to the parks, troops of boys and girls going to and returning from school, gutters filled with falling leaves, house renovations and a general resumption of business activity. But give me the quiet country lane, with the flaming sumach in the fence corner, or the woods gorgeous in their autumn robes, or the winding stream halfcovered with fallen leaves, for a genuine reminder that autumn is here.

One of the good things about autumn, which we all like in a religious way, is our great National Convention. It is the annual opportunity for workers from different parts of the great field to meet and greet each other and plan for larger things. It is the one occasion of the year in which our widely scattered brotherhood can express its unity, in a collective way, and make known to the world something of its work, its spirit, its magnitude and its value as one of the religious factors in Christendom. It is the one great convocation in which all Disciples feel an honest pride and look forward to with deep interest. A business corporation has its annual meeting, where the business of the year is reported, and the company ascertains whether it has made gains or suffered losses during the year. This is important. On a much grander scale religious bodies hold their annual meetings to hear what the Lord has wrought through their efforts, and to gather both wisdom and inspiration for the enlargement of their work. This national rally among the Disciples of Christ takes place each year in October, and this year from the 12th to the 18th of the month. There is every reason to expect a great convention. Plan now to be there and share in its fellowship, in its enthusiasm and in all the feast of fat things which it will afford. Every politician knows that a successful campaign cannot be conducted without great gatherings for the generation of enthusiasm, the dissemination of information and the transaction of business. We can learn zeal and perhaps something in regard to method from the world of politics.

There is something about a great disaster like the recent devastation of the fair city of Galveston which raises the question whether the God of nature, under whose laws these destructive storms occur, be indeed the same God of whom Jesus speaks, as a Father who numbers the very hairs of our head, and without whose notice not even a sparrow falls to the ground. There can, of course, be but one answer to this question. He is the same God. Jesus taught that the God of nature is the Heavenly Father who causes his rain to fall on the just and the unjust. How, then, can we harmonize these destructive agencies with the goodness of God as revealed by Jesus Christ? Well, if we are not able to harmonize them it does not follow that they are incapable of being harmonized, but only that we are incapable of seeing or explaining that harmony with our present knowledge. The reasonable inference would be, in such case, that the finite human mind is not able to comprehend all the reasons which underlie God's administration of the universe. While this is true, we can see enough of the results of such calamities to make it easy to believe that, if we knew more their benevolent character would be very clear to us. See what a mighty impulse the Galveston tragedy has given to the feeling of brotherhood and philanthropy. Notice how gifts are flowing in from all parts of the civilized world to feed and clothe the hungry and naked, to house the homeless and to provide for the sick and disabled. The spectacle makes one believe more in mankind and in the reality of human progress. Who can estimate the value of all

"But what about the thousands of people whose lives were destroyed?" If we count the death of the body a calamity so great that no good can compensate for it, then there is no way of har monizing the destructive forces of nature with the goodness of But we do not so reason. nation goes to war in self-defense it does so in the belief that liberty and national independence are of more value than many lives, for many lives are sure to be sacrificed in war. It is Satan's lie that "all that a man hath will he give for his life." Any man of honor would prefer to die rather than sacrifice his honor, his reputation and the good name of his family. In the teaching of Jesus the death of the body is not treated as a great calamity. In his thought the loss of character is the great and irretrievable calamity. It is probable that when we come to estimate as Jesus did the superior value of all that goes to build up character and enrich the spirit to all material blessings, including the life of the body, it will be far less difficult for us to understand some of the methods of God's administration of the world than it is now. Meanwhile, "we walk by faith," not entirely by sight. That God is good is shown by ten thousand proofs. If in some events, such as that to which we have referred, his goodness is not manifest, let us not doubt for a moment that when the mists and clouds have all drifted away we shall see that both in sunshine and in shadow, and not less in shadow than in sunshine, that his course has been one of goodness and of loving kindness.

Questions and Hnswers.

Is there any relation between the twelve tribes and seventy elders of Israel, and the twelve apostles and seventy disciples sent forth by Jesus? If so, what is it? E. G. J.

It is not improbable that the fact that there were twelve tribes in Israel had something to do with the number of the apostles. The same thing may be true of the seventy disciples who were sent forth by Jesus. These were sacred numbers with the Jews, and in conforming to Jewish ideas as far as possible in this respect, Jesus would be conforming to a well-known principle of success recognized by all intelligent people. The matter is purely conjectural, however, and there is no scriptural data upon which a dogmatic conclusion could be reached.

What was the difference between Moses and Christ in reference to the Sabbath? S. S.

Moses was the lawgiver through whom the seventh day was sanctified, and commanded to be observed as a holy day and a day of rest. Christ lived and died under the Mosaic law, and observed the Sabbath in its true spirit and meaning during his lifetime. His deeds of mercy on the Sabbath day were no violations of the sabbatic law, but only of the traditions of the elders. In his resurrection from the dead, however, on the first day of the week, he forever consecrated a new day, filled with a new spirit, and commemorating a new event in the world's history. His disciples after his resurrection continued to observe that day as a day of assembly and worship in memory of his resurrection, and so the Lord's day of the Christian dispensation has taken the place of the Sabbath of the Jewish dispensation, though there are a few Christians who have not discerned the distinction between the law and the gospel, and are now observing the seventh day of the week under the Fourth Commandment as obligatory upon Christians, not seeming to understand that Moses has been superseded by Christ.

How do you harmonize Romans 9:18 with 1 Timothy 2:4? Young Inquirer.

The first passage cited above says: "So, then, he hath mercy on whom he will, and whom he will he hardeneth." The latter passage reads: "He willeth that all men should be saved, and come to the knowledge of the truth." If we understand that the passage first quoted does not teach that God arbitrarily hardens men's hearts, but that they are hardened through resistance to the divine will, there is no difficulty in harmonizing the two passages. The passage in Romans refers to the case of Pharaoh, and we know what the process was by which his heart was hardened. It was by resisting God's will concerning the Israelites, as that will was made known to him through Moses, and through signs that were wrought in Egypt for the deliverance of Israel. As this took place under the operation of divine law, it is said that "God hardened Pharaoh's heart," according to the custom among the Hebrews, of omitting secondary causes and referring to the primary cause. Interpreted in this way. the passage teaches nothing in antagonism with the truth stated by the same writer in his letter to Timothy, that God wills "that all men should be saved and come to the knowledge of the truth." One thing that prevents all men from being saved is the intervention of the human will which antagonizes the divine will. God respects the human will, and does not force it. "How oft would I have gathered you together, even as a hen gathers her brood under her wings," said Jesus to the Jews, "but ye would not."

A few ministers of the Church of Christ are informing the people in a few localities in this state that the Christian Church has apostatized from the doctrine taught by the church, and taught by Bro. Campbell. They are rebaptizing converts when they have an opportunity. Tell me when they cut loose from the Church of Christ, and what is their history?

Bloomfield, Iowa. S. B. D.

This is a modern form of heresy, having its origin within the last quarter of a century. It has made most progress, perhaps, in Texas. It is a disintegrating force wherever it has spread, and is marked by the spirit of contention and strife. Its hobby is that only those have been baptized in a valid manner, who were baptized for the "remission of sins," understanding clearly at the time that this was the purpose for which they were baptized. It is an utter perversion, of course, not only of the spirit and teaching of the New Testament, but of the teaching and work of Mr. Campbell and his co laborers in religious reform. It is about the worst type of the sectarian spirit which has manifested itself in this country. It thrives on ignorance, and narrowness and bigotry are its characteristic features. Its advocates are the heretics of that class against which the New Testament warns the church, and they should not be received with favor in any community of Christians.

- 1. To whom did Jesus refer when he said, "Other sheep I have which are not of this fold?" (John 10:16.)
- 2. When, where and how did the apostle John die?

 A Reader.
- 1. Jesus refers to those among the Gentiles who were to believe on him when they should hear the gospel, and who would be gathered into the Christian fold. They were already his sheep because of their willingness to receive the truth and to walk in it. The Lord appeared in a vision to Paul in Corinth when he was doing evangelistic work in that city, telling him that he had much people in that city. They had not yet heard him preached, and did not at that time believe on him, but they possessed that honesty of heart and that moral purpose which Jesus recognized as the necessary preparation for receiving the gospel.
- 2. Only ancient tradition furnishes any answer to this question. This tradition is to the effect that after his release from the Isle of Patmos, the Apostle John returned to Ephesus, where he lived to a good old age, and died peacefully near the close of the first century. The tradition is probably reliable

A lady who confessed her faith in Christ and was baptized last year, and who at that time fully intended to serve her Master faithfully, feels that she has sinned grievously against her Lord since she has been a church member. Is there hope of forgiveness for such, and what public steps shall she take? Is it necessary for her to reconfess her faith in Christ and be rebaptized?

Inquirer.

This sister's case is by no means exceptional, owing to the weakness of the flesh. If she realizes that she has "sinned grievously," there is surely hope for her. The most dangerous cases are those who have no realization of sin. She needs no public reconfession of her faith, nor rebaptism. Baptism has no significance except at the beginning of the Christian life. What she needs to do is to repent of her sin and turn to the Lord for his forgiveness, and for strength to keep her in the way of righteoushess, and go on her way rejoicing. If she has wronged the church, she should make her confession to the church, either directly or through the officers of the church. If she has wronged any individual members, she should make it right with them, and having made that reparation, she can, she should seek the forgiveness of God and go forward in the path of Christian duty, admonished by the mistakes of the past to walk closer to her Lord.

Why is this called the twentieth century and how can it be when it is 1900 and it takes one hundred years to complete a century? Each previous century has ended with ninety-nine; why not 1900? E. I.

There are not many people, we hope, who call this the twentieth century. It is the closing year of the nineteenth century. Our querist is wrong in saying that each previous century has ended with ninety-nine. Each preceding century has ended with the completion of one hundred years, just as the nineteeth century will end on the last day of the present year.

- 1. I heard a minister say recently, when the Lord came to the house of Zacchaeus the whole family was converted. Is that so, or does salvation in this passage mean Christ?
- 2. Is there such a thing as "head faith" and "heart faith" taught in the Word of God? Harvey, Ill. Thos. Whitefoot.
- 1. The visit of Christ to any house means salvation to that household when he is accepted as Savior and Lord. The passage referred to above need not be understood as implying that the household of Zacchaeus was all converted at once, but if the head of the family was turned to the Lord, it probably meant a revolution in the whole family.
- 2. No, this distinction is not recognized in the New Testament under these names. There is a living faith, however, and a dead faith, small faith and large faith, and we presume that these distinctions do involve the question of the henrt in our use of the term. A genuine faith in Christ involves the affections and leads to loving and prompt obedience. Any faith that does not issue in obedience is, according to James, a dead faith.

THE PURPOSE OF ACTS.

W. J. BURNER.

Why do we have a Book of Acts? What was the purpose in the mind of the author of this unique piece of literature? An answer to these questions must be based on a study of the book itself, not on some fine theory of divine direction of several individuals toward the production of a Bible. Presumably the author intended to do exactly what he has done, and the result of his work will reveal the purpose.

Of the twenty-eight chapters, sixteen and three-fourths are devoted to Paul. More space is devoted to Paul than to all others combined. It is, therefore, a Pauline book. Luke had a message to somebody, either Theophilus or the class represented by Theophilus, concerning Paul. It is manifestly absurd to make the Pauline section tributary to the smaller section which precedes it.

The book has Paul for its hero, but Paul's theology is left out. Of the great doctrines of Galatians and Romans there is hardly a hint. This has been explained in various ways, but it is probable that the simplest explanation is the best. Luke left out Paul's peculiar teaching because it did not suit his purpose to put it in.

Furthermore, Luke omits to mention Paul's independent apostleship. Paul is not called an apostle in the sense in which the word is applied to the twelve. He and Barnabas are called apostles in Acts 14:4, 14, but the author evidently did not intend to assign them to an equality with Peter and John. (See Acts 1:20-26; 2:32; 10:41.) We are not to infer from this that Luke did not acknowledge Paul's claim to an independent apostleship. It did not suit his purpose to mention the claim. Acts is a historical argument proving that the mission of Paul to the Gentiles is the work of God. This purpose governed the author's selection and arrangement of material. In a word, the book is an apology for Paul. It is a plea before the court of public opinion, not a

The author gives an account of the establishment of the church at Jerusalem. In this account the divine element is prominent. The Holy Spirit descended and the apostles received power to work miracles. Imbedded in this account is the primitive gospel, of which the following is a summary:

- God anoisted Jesus of Nazareth with the Holy Ghost and with power.
- 2. He went about doing good and healing all that were oppressed with the devil; for God was with him.
 - 3. He was slain and raised the third day.
- 4. The apostles are witnesses of his works and his resurrection.
 - 5. To him bear all the prophets witness.
- 6. He was ordained of God to be the Messiah, whose chief function was to judge.
- Those who believe in him receive remission of sins.
- 8. He sent the apostles to preach to the people; that is, to the Jews. (See Acts 10:36-43; 2:14-38; 3:19-23.)

With this for an introduction, Luke produces these arguments:

- God intended the Gentile mission from the beginning. In Acts 1:8 Jesus says that the apostles shall be witnesses, not only in Jerusalem and Judea, but in Samaria and unto the uttermost parts of the earth. He touches the same note in 2:39, where the promise is said to be unto all that are afar off, even as many as the Lord our God shall call. Luke follows this program. While the Jerusalem church was composed of people who were all the better Jews for being Christians, Stephen preached a Christianity that was not dependent upon the temple and its worship. This was the first step away from the primitive teaching and toward the mission of Paul. Philip took another. He preached to the Samaritans, the apostles endorsed his work, and God confirmed it by bestowing the Holy Ghost. Here was a form of Christianity as valid as that of the Jerusalem church, but entirely separate from the national worship. Step number three was the conversion of the Ethiopian eunuch. The Samaritans kept the law, but this man was a proselvte contrary to the law. (See Deut. 23:1.) The validity of his conversion was miraculously attested. The fourth step was taken when the Gentile Cornelius and his household were baptized. Luke devotes a chapter and a half to showing the solid basis of miracle on which this act rested. It was worth the space. Gentiles whose Christianity was undeniable were essential to his argument. God had prepared the way for the mission to the Gentiles.
- 2. God directed and attested the work of Paul. If he punished Ananias through Peter, he punished Bar-Jesus through Paul. If Peter was miraculously delivered from the prison in Jerusalem, Paul was delivered by the same God from the prison in Philippi. If Peter healed the sick and cast out demons, Paul had the same power. The Lord spoke to him in visions, and the Holy Spirit forbade him to preach in one province and led him to another. This divine work was acknowledged by the three pillar apostles and by the Jerusalem church.
- 3. The enmity of the Jews did not prove that Paul was a bad man. The generation was untoward (Acts 2:40). Their fathers had been the same. They opposed those who preached Christ as their fathers had opposed all the prophets (Acts 7:51,52). They had attempted the destruction of the Jerusalem church and the apostles. At Pisidian Antioch and Iconium they opposed Paul through envy (Acts 17:5). They made false charges against him at Jerusalem (Acts 21:5).
- 4. There was a darker and more dangerous charge against Paul, which necessitated a careful and elaborate defense. He had been the cause or the occasion of many disturbances of the peace. He had escaped from Damascus in a basket and had left Jerusalem between two days. On one occasion he had been brought before Gallio's judgment seat; at another time Ephesus had been in an uproar because of him; on a third occasion he had been cast out of the temple at Jerusalem, and the prompt interference of a Roman officer saved his life. He had spent years in prison. Finally, he had been executed as a criminal, as a man dangerous to the peace of the empire. He certainly had need of an advocate if his work was to endure. Luke's answer to the charge is conclusive. Paul was the friend of the Roman governor of Cyprus; his punishment at Philippi was unjust; he was declared innocent by Gallio, and no charge could be brought against him at Ephesus: Lysias, Felix, Festus and Agrippa attested his innocence at Jerusalem; he was sent to Rome at his own motion, and no accusation was made by the Roman officials: on the disastrous voyage to Rome, though a prisoner in chains, he secured the respect of the officer in charge of the prisoners, and at Rome he was treated with a leniency which a dangerous man would not be apt to experience. Luke was wisely silent concerning his condemnation.

This theory of the purpose of Acts accounts easily and naturally for the whole book. Is there any other theory of which the same can be said?

Irvington, Ind.

A CHURCH BENEFICIARY SYSTEM.

F. M. CUMMINGS.

The work of biblical criticism may be regarded as about finished. The readjustment of the dogmas of the churches will occupy some years and create much confusion for a time, but the main conclusions of the critics will be accepted and the public will find the foundations of religious faith and life remaining unshaken. There are certainly many preachers and congregations who are settled in this conviction and who ought to be ready for progress in practical Christianity.

One of the most serious leaks in the church is the fraternal order which draws so heavily on the young men that it means disaster to the churches if they do not meet this need and meet it promptly. The conditions of modern life are such that the beneficiary society is a necessity and the healthy, active young men, the very ones we need in the churches, go into the society, put their money, time and energy there, and the church is left.

These fraternal bonds are stronger than church ties and young men seek the society of lodge brethren in preference to church brethren, and these associations are generally carried on under conditions from which religion is absent and morals not always duly emphasized. Now, let the churches that are not fretting their souls to death over the higher criticism organize a beneficiary system-not simply some limited congregational affair which will amount to next to nothing, but a general system, so that if a Christian travels to other sections he can have the benefit of it. Church aid in obtaining employment, maintaining civil rights, relief in emergencies, sick benefits, funeral expenses when necessary, protection to dependent families, and possibly some life assurance can be given just as easily as in the fraternal orders.

It will be necessary for the church to avoid that ruinous mutual insurance system which works so splendidly and furnishes good insurance at low rates while the order can be kept full of healthy young lives, but which goes speedily to wreck as soon as the death rate begins to be large. This is no wild, speculative scheme. The churches must either meet the needs and conditions of modern life or pretty soon fall behind the natural increase of population, and when that once takes place the hand of fate will write "failure" on the wall of the death chamber of the Protestant Church, and God will employ a new agent for the redemption of the world.

THE GLADSTONE-HUXLEY CONTROVERSY—IV.

DEAN A. M. HAGGARD.

PROF. HUXLEY'S FOOTNOTE.

No doubt some one is here ready to ask me this question: "Did not Prof. Huxley in a footnote tell his readers that the scorpions were later than the wing? Did he not say, 'The insect's wing is older than the scorpion's?' And if so, have you not been too severe with the great scientist?" He did put in such a footnote and he did use the words quoted, but what for? Not to correct his false impression at all, but to bulldoze it through! His footnote reminds me of a California incident in 1849. John P. St. John and other young men found themselves at the approach of winter and out of work and no money. They were newcomers. At last they hired to a settler to chop cordwood till spring. In the spring their employer told them that he was bankrupt and could not pay them. Although the case seemed hopeless they took it to a lawyer. He advised them to put a lien on the wood! To the boys this was an unheard-of proceedure and they were skeptical, but the lawyer took them to a justice of the peace where the following conversation occured:

"What can I do for you, gentlemen?"

"These young men want a lien on a certain lot of cordwood."

"Great Scots, man! you cannot put a lien on cordwood!"

"Yes we can! you are a fine justice of the peace, you are! Of course we can! Don't you know that much?"

"You can't find it in the code."

"Yes I can. Give me the code. Here it is: "Any structure, superstructure," etc. (and so he read on.)

"Well sir, there is nothing there about cordwood."

"Yes there is! Are you a numbskull? Superstructure is Latin; it is the Latin for cordwood!"

The justice yielded, put on the lien and the boys got their money. Bluff sometimes succeeds when all the facts are against you. Mr. Huxley plays a clean game of bluff in that footnote. And closes by patting himself on the back for his exceeding fairness in discussion!! The facts plainly stated are harder on him than anything I could say.

It is well to remember that Mr. Gladstone did not enter this discussion as an expert in either Hebrew or geology. He makes express mention of this more than once and presents authorities of recognized ability. It is more than interesting to see how Prof. Huxley disposes of these. Nine names were quoted in the November Magazine; of these Mr. Huxley deigned to notice but one. Cavier alone is mentioned and admitted as pertinent to the discussion. But he is ruled out because he was not recent, having died in 1832. Mr. Gladstone then backed up his word and the word of Cuvier by five of the best known scientists, among them Professors Dana and Prestwitch. How did the wily debater meet this emergency? By asking that Mr. Gladstone get them all to sign a joint memorial saying that birds appeared before certain reptiles—a statement which was not true and which Mr. Gladstone did not believe and which he repudiated all along! It was a shrewd effort to catch Mr. Gladstone on a scientific technicality and thus evade the main issue. It is plain that a great body of experts saw the facts of geology as teaching one thing and Mr. Huxley saw them as teaching something quite the contrary. Why did he not see with them at least in the general outlines? May not the answer be that he had so damaged his power of scientific sight that he could not? Is not an honest, pure heart essential in seeing more persons and things than God? In the case of the wing and the scorpions did he not blind his eyes and sear his scientific conscience? How many times had he done so? Was it a habit of his? Who would not far sooner trust the honest eyes and the pure conscience of James D. Dana?

Mr. Huxley more than once insinuates that Mr. Gladstone had not thought it worth his while to look into the works of Prof. Dana and thinks this very strange and surprising. In all probability it was only an insinuation, but it caused a Mr. Sutherland to write to Prof. Dana shortly after the debate was closed. In the letter he asked the opinion of the great American geologist upon the merits of the controversy. You will find the full text of his reply in the Nineteenth Century for August, 1886, p. 304. I quote but one sentence: "I agree in all essential points with Mr. Gladstone and believe that the first chapter of Genesis and science are in accord,"

SOME CONCLUSIONS.

In a few paragraphs I would sum up this discussion and apply its principles to the problems of our day.

"Nothing is infallible save truth," is a late and wise dictum. What is the truth concerning Genesis and science? I cannot determine this question for you. Nor can Mr. Gladstone, nor Prof. Huxley, nor Prof. Drummond, nor Prof. Smith determine it for me. I must decide for myself. This I have attempted to do. To insure as large a degree of success as possible, I have taken special care to do three things: (1) I began with the assumption that a special pleader for Mr. Gladstone would not be as successful in arriving at the truth as one who took a judicial view of the whole case. I therefore dismissed all purpose to uphold the great English statesman. (2) I have learned that deep prejudice for an opponent or contempt, though it be mild and courteous, may blind the eyes to certain facts known and loved by your opponent. Hence, I have made sure of my love for Professors Smith and Drummond and my respect for Haeckel, Huxley and Reville. My purpose has been to accept every fact they present and deal with it as sacred. I have sought to adjust my thinking to facts rather than to torture facts to fit my philosophy. (3) I have not forgotten that experts have rights which must not be set aside for any purpose whatever. They must be sacred to all true thinkers. Nor have I forgotten that these rights have boundaries within which they reign supreme and outside of which they become tyranny as galling as papal lordship. (4) I have assumed that Jesus Christ as Lord of truth takes a real interest in all seekers for truth and that he will and does help the more careful, the more conscientious, the more humble to a nearer approach than is possible to the proud and careless. Believing thus, I have prayed for years, not for infallibility—the impossible—but for an approach so near to truth that I might stand solid as Gibraltar in the storms of philosophical doubt and help my struggling brother to find a standing-place. The good Lord has given me a large answer to that prayer. He has set my feet on solid rock. He has filled my soul with a large charity and a splendid and indescribable sense of freedom. On this splendid mountain top I stand, not to dictate to a brother, but to declare what in such lights I see as truth. One of many truths, certainly not the greatest. is this: The first chapter of Genesis is in harmony with science. I know that such a confession brands a man in certain quarters as beneath the serious attention of the scholarly. It puts upon the shoulders of a sensitive man a heavy, galling cross and sometimes presses into his brow the thorns of a painful crown. But a lover of truth cannot be a puppet or a machine; he must be a man and a free man in spite of the thorny crowns and the heavy crosses.

In claiming harmony between Genesis and science I have not forgotten the other truth, that the Old Testament must meet the just demands of literature. Would-be scientists have frequently made unreasonable demands of the Bible and ambitious students of literature are making unreasonable demands of it; but no truth in science can ever contradict a truth in literature, nor can a truth in literature ever annihilate a truth in science. Truth is one with God. The tests of science applied to Genesis will either dishonor themselves, as in the case of Prof. Huxley, or declare the divine element therein. Modern literary research will either hopelessly entangle its champion, as in the case of Henry Drummond, or it will declare the presence in Genesis of a factor not to be accounted for by the canons of literature.

No man can hope to satisfy all others in his statement of truth; therefore it is not a surprise that Mr. Gladstone's position failed to meet the expectations of his illustrious opponents. This failure was in part due, I think, to an effort to prove too much. And Prof. Drummond probably went to the other extreme and tried to disprove too much. Mr. Gladstone took splendid evidence for purposes of rebuttal and used it for purposes of an opening affirmative. A more careful and modest design on his part would no doubt have made his case much stronger. But as it was he fought a battle so strong that one of his opponents took refuge in dogmatism that would shame a pope and in deliberate perversion of facts. Another became so tangled in his words that his biographer was compelled to put him before his readers in a sorry plight and with a lame defense. And not least, he won a very valuable verdict from Prof. Dana. Would it be immodest to suggest that those who have formed their ideas of Genesis from the materials furnished by such men as Professors Smith, Drummond and Huxley could do no better thing than to go over the ground once more de novo?

The young men of to-day can do nothing better than to ask themselves about the foundations of modern thinking. Are the leaders of thought as deep and as thorough as their predecessors? The thought of the second century was not as deep and thorough as that of Christ and his apostles; the seventeenth century was shallow and barren where the reformers were deep and fresh; literature, government and religion constantly present periods of deep and abiding thought followed by shallows; are there not more than the usual number now in the shallows of thought? If so, will not the Lord Jesus have to save the worll of science as well as the church? Do not worship the older generation of thinkers, neither despise them, but go as deeply into the foundations of your problems as they did into theirs. Do not worship any man because he carries a full complement of modern diplomas. The college of apostles and the Master combined did not make twelve Johns or twelve Peters. Find your leaders and make them your teachers. And in choosing your teachers remember that truth alone is infallible and that truth cares nothing for popular favor or for majorities. Truth is truth in or out of popular favor. Neither a conservative nor a radical majority is proof positive of truth. Truth is helpful, but not everything relied upon for help is truth. Calvinism as framed and taught by the great Genevan is not true, but many yet cling to it for help; Unitarianism, Mormonism, Theosophy and Christian Science can summon to court hosts to testify that they are helpful. Truth is the oldest thing in the world; find it. Truth is the newest thing in the world; find it. Truth is in Christ Jesus; find him. Truth is far from the careless, the thoughtless, the proud and the wicked; go not that way. Truth has no mercy on my sins or my philosophy; it banishes one and may shatter the other as it did that of Saul of Tarsus. Truth does not divide its lovers, but brings them to the unity for which the Master prayed. God multiply the truth-seekers of this new century, into which we are entering!

THE IMPORTANCE OF KEEP-ING CONVERTS.

B. F. MANIRE.

Samuel D. Hastings in a letter to the New Voice says of the manner in which prohibitionists have been working: "We make converts, but we lose thousands because we do not keep them under the influence of the truths that converted them." The Voice aptly characterizes this as "a masterly statement of a transcendently important truth," and then adds with reference to the converts that are made to the cause of prohibition: "Let us keep them under the influence of the truths that converted them." It is a fact that this "masterly statement" of Mr. Hastings is just as true of much of our evangelistic and church work as it is in his judgment of prohibition work. We make many converts to the cause of Christ; but we lose many because we do not keep them under the influence of the truths that converted them.

All preachers and churches ought to know, and certainly do know, that it is one thing to make converts, but quite a different thing to keep them, yet preachers and churches often act as if they did not know it. It is often more difficult to keep converts than it is to make them; yet the success of any cause depends as much on keeping the converts as it does on making them, if not more. Each of these departments of labor, however, is all-important in its own place. Converts must be made or there will be none to keep; and converts must be kept or but little permanent good, if any, will result from making them. Indeed, to make converts and then to lose them may do more harm both to them and to the cause we wish to establish than not to have made them at all. "For it were better for them not to have known the way of righteousness than after knowing it to turn back from the holy commandment delivered unto them" (2 Pet. 2:21).

It should be the aim of every evangelist and the work of every church to keep all converts under the influence of the truths that converted them. In the failure to do this we find the cause of so many sad losses to so many churches. Of the many converts made at our protracted meetings a large per cent. are lost simply because we fail to keep them under the influence of the truths that converted them. This is a most disastrous departure from the teaching of Jesus and the practice of the apostles and their co-laborers. The sooner we return to the primitive practice in this respect, the better will it be both for the prosperity of the local churches and the extension of the kingdom of God. The great fundamental truths that turn men to Christ are the truths that keep them in Christ and build them up in the Christian life; hence the transcendent importance of keeping them under the influence of these truths.

The great commission enjoins the keeping of converts as well as the making of them.

"Go ye, therefore, and make disciples of all the nations, baptizing them into the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit: teaching them to observe all things whatsoever I command you." Teaching them to observe all things commanded—this is the way to keep them. This was exempli fied in Jerusalem on and after the day of Pentecost. "They then that received his Word were baptized and there were added unto them in that day about three thousand souls. And they continued steadfastly in the apostles' teaching and fellowship, in the breaking of bread and the prayers." Thus converts were made, and thus they were kept under the influence of the truths that converted them in the city of Jerusalem where the work of the apostles began. They pursued the same course everywhere else; and we should follow their example.

Brethren, let us strive, in the love and by the help of God, to make as many converts to the cause of Christ as we can in this the last year of the nineteenth century; and at the same time let us use all the means which God has placed within our hands to keep these converts under the influence of the glorious truths that converted them. Thus will they and we enter the twentieth century fully panoplied for the great conflict which before its close, we trust, will win the world for Christ.

Jackson, Miss.

From the Land of the Mesquite.

Reading so much of summer assemblies causes me to attempt a report of the Northwest Texas camp meeting, held near Spring Creek, in Throckmorton County, August 2-13. Fully a thousand people were regularly encamped around the foot of the large hill upon which stood the great white tabernacle, seating some twenty-five hundred people. The crowds were augmented by the large number who lived near and drove to the grounds daily. Every department of the work was represented; every day crowded, beginning with sunrise prayer meeting, Junior C. E., C. W. B. M., C. E., and three preaching services followed in rapid succession.

Brethren R. Clark and R. R. Hamlin did the preaching. Fully a dozen other ministers were present. Bro. and Sister Douthit, Texas' beloved singing evangelists, led the large chorus choir. The fellowship was delightful; even in the camps the people did not seem to be seeking pleasure; they were there on the Master's business, and in the eleven days about thirty souls were brought to him.

A summer assembly is not a novelty, but a camp meeting on the plains of Texas, thirty miles from a railroad, certainly was to many of us. Yet, it is an annual occurrence here as well as in other parts of the state. A grocery store, butchershop, laundry, bakershop, long-distance telephone, etc., caused us to forget we were in a land which only a few years ago was an endless plain occupied by buffalo and the wild horse. One well said it was literally hurling Christianity at the setting sunsaying: "God's people have no frontier," and solving the problem of taking the gospel to the people, A. LYNN CLINKINBEARD.

Our Budget.

- -Kansas City, Oct. 12-18.
- -All eyes are turning to the city at the mouth of the Kaw.
- -The occasion is our great national convention-three in one-Home, Foreign, C. W. B. M.
- -The West will be there en masse, because a notable gathering has come close to them; the other parts of the country will be there to see the West-and enjoy the convention.
- -Armory Hall, where the convention meets, will hold a large convention, but we expect to see its capacity fully tested, especially at the great communion service. It will be an occasion worth going a great way to see and feel, and it will be worth remembering. Plan to go to the Kansas City Convention.
 - -This month ends another missionary year.
- -Preparations should be well under way for attending the General Convention in Kansas City next month.
- -All who are indebted to either one of the missionary societies, state, home or foreign, by pledge or otherwise, should remit at once.
- -If we are to reach the $250,000 mark for Church Extension this year it must be done at once. The churches that have not yet made an offering for this work should do so at once. The matter is of urgent importance.
- -If the party writing us articles on Christian Science without signing them only knew how quickly they got from our hands into the waste basket he or she might save him or herself much unnecessary trouble. We have no time to waste on anonymous letters, to say nothing about nebulous theories.
- -The Herald, Columbia, Mo., for August 31st, contains a fine report of the Missouri Sundayschool Association convention which was held in that city Aug. 28-30. On the first page of the Herald are excellent half-tone pictures of the leading officers of the association. Among them is W. H. McClain of the First Christian Church of this city. Bro. McClain is V.-P. of the association and business manager of the Evangel, published in this city in the interest of the work.
- -The 84th conference of the M. E. Church (South) for Missouri was held in Fulton last week and was well attended and enjoyed by the people of Fulton. Two of the most popular men present were W. B. Palmore, editor of the St. Louis Christian Advocate, and Dr. John Mathews, formerly pastor of the Centenary Church, this city. In his lecture on Temperance and Prohibition Dr. Palmore said: "The battle of Armageddon will be fought early in the new century between organized conscience and organized greed; that is, between the church and the saloon." That may be, but organized conscience and organized greed will include the struggle between labor and capital and other evils as well as the liquor traffic.
- -Returning from a little excursion down the lake one day during the past summer at Macatawa Park, when the little steamer hove in full view of the cottages crowning the hills and lining the shore of Lake Michigan, the editor in a moment of enthusiastic admiration, offered a prize for the best poem on Macatawa, containing not less than three stanzas nor more than ten. We have now received three poems in response to that offer, and will print them soon anonymously, leaving our readers to decide on their merits, and afterwards we will give the names of the authors. We hold the poems a few days for any belated poet who may wish to enter the race. We reserve the right to publish or not, as we may deem best.

- -We have a letter at this office for W. S. Furguson, and also one for W. H. Phillips. If these brothren will send us their present address these letters will be forwarded.
- -The American Christian Missionary Society is making an earnest effort to close the year with full collections. There are 300 pledged to take the May offering that have not yet remitted and the secretary is making an earnest plea with these and others to remit. The society just received $500 on the annuity plan and $1,000 as a memorial fund. We hope all those churches having Home Mission funds on hand will send them in before the close of the month. Send all money for Home Missions to Benj. L. Smith, Y. M. C. A. Building, Cincinnati, O.
- -The assistant editor of this paper visited the brethren in Hematite, Mo., on last Sunday. The day was cool and pleasant and good audiences were present both morning and evening. We see no reason why this church and the one in Festus, six miles away, should not co-operate in the support of a preacher between them. Each of these congregations still has substantial material and the field for enlargement is certainly good. The time has certainly come when the weaker churches should be grouped together in the support of proper and needful pastoral work. protracted meeting once or twice a year does not meet the spiritual wants of rural churches.
- -D. D. MacLean, of Bowling Green, Fla., testifies to the ability of members to work even under the most discouraging circumstances. He says that all told they number only twelve Disciples of Christ in Bowling Green, and vet. these twelve, besides meeting their own expenses, gave to Foreign Missions, $10; to Home Missions, $10.50; to famine sufferers, $10.15; to Children's Day, $5; to state work, $5; to Church Extension, $10; to C. W. B. M. general fund, $18.75. Total, Proportionate giving by the entire brotherhood to that of this little band would have snowed our missionary treasurers under with money. We commend the faith and works of this little hand to all our do-nothing churches.
- -We have received a card from Mr. and Mrs. Lathrop C. Stow, of Grand Rapids, Mich, announcing the marriage of their daughter, Miss Bertha, to Mr. Harvey Erwin Witmer, on September 13. Our intimate acquaintance with the bride and our knowledge of her charming character leads us to extend our hearty congratulations to the fortunate bridegroom, whom we do not know, but whose good sense we greatly admire. To both of the happy pair we offer our best wishes for their future happiness and usefulness. May they "walk this world yoked in all exercise of noble end," until their life purpose be accomplished.
- -The program of the New York state convention did not reach us early enough to appear in our last issue. It will be held this week in Niagara Falls on the same days of the Michigan convention in Grand Rapids and includes the Ministerial Association and the C. W. B. M. of the state. The Ministerial Association will hold its session on Tuesda the 18th, with addresses in the forenoon by G. B. Townsend, in the afternoon by J. M. Philputt and in the evening by M. E. Harlan. Wednesday, the 19th, will be given to reports and business of the missionary society with an address in the afternoon by B. A. Jenkins, and in the evening by B. Q. Denham, of New York. The C. W. B. M. session will occupy Thursday, with addresses in the afternoon by the president, Mrs. Laura Gerould Craig, and in the evening by Miss Mary Graybeil and Miss Adelaid Gail Frost, both of India. On Friday addresses will be given in the forenoon by G. W. Muckley, in the afternoon by Dr. O. P. Gifford and in the evening by C. C. Smith.

What are Humors?

They are vitiated or morbid fluids coursing the veins and affecting the tissues. They are commonly due to defective digestion but sometimes inherited.

How do they manifest themselves?

In many forms of cutaneous eruption, salt rheum or eczema, pimples and boils, and in weakness, languor and general debility.
How are they expelled? By

Hood's Sarsaparilla

which also builds up the system that has suffered from them.

. It is the best of all medicines for all humors.

- -The catalog of Michigan College for 1899-1900, with announcements for 1900-1901 presents the last year's record and the future outlook of a growing school. Those who are casting about for a school to attend or to have their children attend should send for this catalog and note its claims.
- The Buckeye Bell Foundry, Cincinnati, has a fine article in the Western Architect and Builder for July, in which some very novel and suprising things are stated in relation to the casting of large bells. The Buckeye Bell Company probably stands at the head of this industry in the United Statas.
- -At a meeting of the congregation at Cascade, Mich., last Lord's day, it was settled to celebrate the thirty-fifth anniversary of the congregation October 6th and 7th. The church expects this to be one of the best of times. If any one who has preached at Cascade in the past or any one who was once a member of the congregation there should read this notice, will you not add to the interest of the anniversary by writing a letter to be read at the Lord's day service. Address Wm. Chapple, pastor, Cascade, Kent County, Mich.
- -We are in receipt of a circular or prospectus of the Bible lectures of Bro. J. S. Hughes entitled "A Week of Religious Awakening: The Last Days of Early Christianity and its Coming Glory.' These lectures of Bro. Hughes are also called "Seven Nights with John in Patmos." Mr. Hughes has made a specialty of "The Last Days of Early Christianity." And in this fruitful field he has found much to help the church to-day in its struggles with the powers of darkness. These lectures are highly commended by various well-known brethren in the circular mentioned and can be secured by addressing the author at Station O., Chicago. We would be glad to see Bro. Hughes kept busy in delivering these lectures. Plan for these lectures in your church during the coming autumn and winter.
- -The brotherhood will be glad to know that on September 13 there was $238,703,11 in our Extension Fund and that we now lack only $11,296 .-89 of reaching the quarter-million mark. It needs now but a special effort on next Sunday, the 23rd, among all the churches that have not taken or sent in their offering, and the hoped-for result will be attained. If the offering is taken on next Sunday and promptly forwarded to G. W. Muckley, Kansas City, Mo., it will reach the office before the books close at noon on Saturday, the 29th. Let the apportionment be sent if possible. The strongest churches have not yet sent in their offerings and we urge that they do so early next week.
- -I. W. Cameron, pastor of the Church of Christ in Weldon, Ia., and the Adventists of that city are exchanging views on the life and immortality question through the Weldon News. In the issue of that paper for September 13th Bro. Cameron gives an able review of an Adventist tract or booklet on the subject.

-The receipts for Foreign Missions for thirteen days of September amount to $5,642.99, or a gain of $1,780 81 over the corresponding thirteen days of 1899. The total receipts for the year up to Sept. 13, amount to $159,076.95, or a gain of $24,815.77 The books close for the current missionary year September 30. Whatever is done now must be done quickly. No offering will be credited on this year that reaches the treasury after September 30. Send offerings to F. M. Rains, Treas., Box 884, Cincinnati, Ohio.

-At the conclusion of the services in the First Christian Church of this city, on last Sunday, the resignation of its pastor, F. O. Fannon was read to the congregation. The matter came as a great surprise to the congregation. The basis of the resignation was financial situation. The resignation was referred to the official board of the church in the hope that the difficulty which seemed to stand in the way of Bro. Fannon's continuance as the pastor of the church could be removed, the resignation reconsidered and the present relation continued. Bro. McCanne and his family, who some months ago moved into the vicinity of the Mt. Cabanne Church changed their church memberships last Sunday. There was no preachers' meeting in this office on last Monday on account of the migration of preachers toward Moberly.

-The program of the Michigan state convention did not reach us in time to appear last week, and as it is in session this week in Grand Rapids its appearance in this paper would be of little service to any one. The program is a triple one. It contains the sessions of the Michigan Missionary Society, the Michigan C. W. B. M., and the Michigan Christian Ministerial Association. To say that it is a strong program is to put the facts in a very moderate way, and we are sure that the delegates are enjoying a feast in Grand Rapids this week. We regret that we could not have had the program a few days earlier that it might have appeared in our issue last week. The sessions of the Ministerial Association come first, beginning on Monday night, and will present a fine exposition of practical themes by practical men. The other convention sessions will not come behind in interest with their respective parts. The names on the program will bear us out in this statement.

-N. B. Cooksey, of Olney, Ill, has devised a new method for the collection of money for the payment of church debts. It is called "The 20th Century Flying Roll." It is a sort of printed subscription paper sent by mail from friend to friend asking for not less than a dime to be sent direct to the pastor of the church soliciting the help by each receiver of a flying roll and the same signed with amount forwarded and then sent on to another to do likewise. Each flying roll is to be kept rolling or flying until full of names and then returned and filed in the archives of the church. We expect that the air will soon be full of flying rolls-for a season at least.

-The C. W. B. M. quarterly meeting of St. Louis will be held at Tuxedo, Friday, Sept. 28. A missionary from India, probably Miss Adelaide Frost, will address the meeting. A good program, as usual, will be given.

-A letter from Bro. B. A. Jenkins dated Macatawa, Mich., Sept. 12, says:

The worst storm in years occurred here last night. People are all excited this morning have engaged passage from Chicago on the Holland, but of course came by rail. The Soo is still at Macatawa Dock. Great trees are down in the grove. No damage to houses.

This was the West Indies hurricane that devastated Galveston on its way to the Atlantic Coast, where it struck Cape Breton Island.

-The communication from O. P. Spiegel, including a letter from Bro. Lamar, will be interesting, especially to our readers in the South. They will be interested in the reminiscence of Bro. Lamar, and in the good news of the success of the gospel in this last meeting. That first meeting, however, was a tremendous success, for which we are all thankful, if it accomplished what Bro. Lamar says it did.

-The meeting recently held by Chas. M. Fillmore, pastor of the church in Carthage, Ohio, on "Politics and Religion" as reported in the Review and News, cannot result in other than good. Bro. Fillmore said many wise and timely things, among which we quote the following:

Under our form of government every citizen has a multitude of duties resting upon him, and he is not released from any of those duties when he becomes a Christian, but must now feel that he must discharge them in a way that will be acceptable to his great Lord and Master.

A Remarkable Offer.

On the second page of this issue will be found what is probably the most remarkable book offer ever made by us. Ten splendid cloth-bound volumes, each book having a distinct and practical value, aggregating almost 4,000 pages, for FIVE DOLLARS -this is our offer!

At regular prices, purchased singly, these books would cost $16.00. We have sold thousands of copies at this rate. The volumes we are now offering are NOT damaged, or spoiled, or shelf-worn. Our offer is genuine in every particular. The books are clean and new; they are substantially bound. They are a splendid bargain at the price named.

No intelligent Disciple, and certainly no preacher, should be without these volumes. In the stories of the lives of the pioneers is told the story of the Reformation. The best history of the beginnings of our government is found in the biographies of Washington, Adams, Jefferson, Franklin and other patriots. The best history of the great "Reformation of the Ninetenth Century" will be found in the biographies of these heroic pioneers-Campbell, Smith, Franklin, Goodwin, Shaw, Rogers, etc.

This offer of the "Biographical and Historical Library" will remain open from the present time until November 1, when it will positively be withdrawn. We reserve the right, however, to withdraw the offer at any time prior to November 1, if our stock of these books shall become exhausted.

California Convention Notes.

Our state convention has closed and Mrs. Sweeney and myself, with many others, are remaining over to enjoy the balmy breezes of Santa Cruz Bay.

Jesse H. Hughes, George W. Sweeney, Wm. H. Martin and R. L. McDalton were elected at the late California state convention as delegates to the National Convention at Kansas City.

J. H. Hughes has served the California state convention for the past two years as president and was unanimously nominated for a third year, which last he declined.

J. H. McCullough preached on the second Sunday of the California state convention at the morning hour on "Life," and Dean Hiram VanKirk preached at night on "Apostolic Missionary Methods."

At the late state meeting of California, George W. Sweeney preached on the first Sunday morning on the "Word Becoming Flesh and Dwelling Among Men." A. C. Smither preached at night on the "Church." The audiences on both Sundays were said to have been the largest in the history of said to have been con-California state meetings.

Dersonal Mention.

O. D. Jones, of Edina, Mo., has published a book of 105 pages entitled "Politics of the Nazarene." Price of the book, 50 cents.

On Sept. 9th the tenth anniversary of the pastorate of A. C. Smither with the First Christian Church, Los Angeles, Cal., was appropriately observed with special services and sermon.

- G. F. Rogers has decided to remain with the church at Illiopolis, Ill., another year, having already served the church in the capacity of pastor for almost seven years.
- R. G. Adams, of Youngstown, Ohio, says that he can put any church desiring a first-class meeting in correspondence with an excellent man is an orator and holds rousing meetings."

A sermon recently preached by C. P. Smith, pastor of the Church of Christ in Richmond, Mo., on "The World's Great Enigma," was published in the Richmond Missourian of Sept. 6th It is a sermon that is both comforting and strengthening to the Christian.

W. S. Errett, of Carbondale, Ill., gave us a very pleasant call last week. He was returning from a visit to the church in Waverly, Ill. A church that enjoys wholesome doctrine would do well to secure the services of Bro. Errett.

John Williams, pastor of the Church of Christ in Whiting, Ia., says that the hotel in that town is for sale and they would be glad to have a Christian family purchase it. The price is $2,200, and he says that it is doing a fine business.

A minister, a thorough college graduate and full of the missionary spirit, would be glad to correspond with any church wanting a protracted meeting. Will hold a meeting for the free will offering. Address Minister, Box 292, Jonesboro,

Geo. R. Beardslee's address and residence is Wabash, Ind., instead of Washington as stated in a notice in this column in a preview paper. He preaches for the church at Granger, Ind., one-half time and would be glad to find a church that could take the remainder of his time.

J. W. Lowber, of Austin, Texas, has an oppor-tunity of getting good pay from Eastern maga-zines and also from English magazines for articles along the line of his book, "Cultura," but he is writing a new book and does not feel that he can undertake any more work.

President E. V. Zollars, Hiram, O., desires to call the attention of any church that is planning to hold revival meetings, to the merits of J. L. McDonald as an evangelist. He says that Bro. McDonald has had large and successful experience, preaches strong gospel sermons and is sound, logical and convincing that he is both edifying and instructive, and his meetings always leave the church in a healthy condition. He co-operates in the most fraternal way with the pastor. He may be addressed at Hiram, O., and ought to be kept busy holding meetings.

A. W. Davis, an evangelist who has been working under the auspices of the Kentucky state board has been spending a few weeks in this city, undergoing treatment for his turous. A PLAIN STATEMENT.

About two years ago "Silver and Gold" was published. Since that time we have sold One Hundred and Fifty Thousand copies. This fact proves, beyond all question, that "Silver and Gold" is a song-book of the highest class. No poor book, no book that was merely "pretty fair" could have had such a circulation. Its worth made it popular, and its popularity has proven its worth.

We have prepared a little pamphlet, containing sample pages (reduced) and price-list of this song-book. This pamphlet is sent, free, to all who request it. Write to Hackleman Music Co, Indianapolis, or to The Christian Publishing Co.,

The present membership of the church is 775. e Second Church of Christ has been organized thin the last eighteen months, and now has a mbership of 170, and is building a handsome use of worship, which will be dedicated about first of December.

During the six years the congregation of the First Church has raised and paid out over $31,000 for all purposes, $19,000 being spent on the lot and handsome building at the corner of Oak and Seminary Streets. The spiritual growth of the congregation has been good, and as a moral and spiritual force it stands second to no organization in Danville, and its missionary efforts are world-wide. The pastor pointed out that the congre-gation had the greatest opportunity of its his ory just before it, but said certain things would be needful in order to make the most of this opportunity.—Danville Democrat.

The Makers of the Bethany Read. ing Courses.

The picture which we present on the cover this week will be of unusual interest to that large and growing company of both young and old who are following the Bethany C. E. Reading Courses. It is a matter of congratulation, not only that we have at last undertaken this work of providing a systematic course of religious reading, but that its direction has been placed in the hands of men so truly representative of our best scholarship. One of the most important educational problems of the present generation and one the importance of which is being more and more recognized by pedagogical specialists, is the problem of making the higher education also a broader education. The immense success of the Chautauqua movement and the growing popularity of the University Extension method give evidence that this need is recognized—the need of ways for giving to the many those things which have until recently been too much confined to the comparative few who can enjoy the advantages of college and university study. The Bethany C. E. Reading Courses are the Chautauqua of the Disciples. The courses have been laid out and the handbooks and weekly readings prepared by men whose scholarly attainments and zealous devotion have eminently fitted them for the performance of the task. It is to be hoped that in the year's study, which begins October 1, the enrollment will be much larger than it has ever been before. The call for volunteers here should appeal to your desire for the best things for yourself; and it need not be a selfish desire, either, for the larger the enrollment the more certain it is that the reading courses will be a permanent suc-

Why Attend the National Convention?

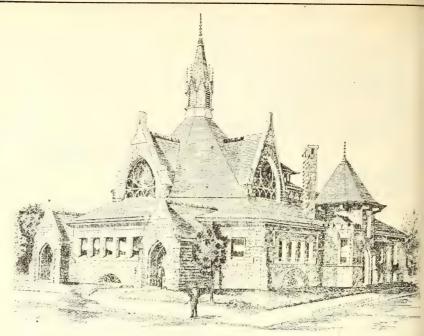

Before the Cincinnati convention we had no church in our little town, and as there were only four or five Disciples of Christ in this part of the country it seemed to be a great undertaking to try to effect an organization. We did not see our way clear to employ a minister to hold a meeting for us, but after returning from Cincinnati we had a great supply of faith, warmer heart and a freer pocketbook.

After obtaining T. A. Lindenmeyer, of Lexington, Neb., to hold a meeting, a church was organized with 28 members, including four schoolteachers. We are glad to say that these results were brought about through the inspiration received from the sweet songs and grand thoughts by noble men and women at the Cincinnati Convention.

As you read these few lines think of the souls that have been saved in the United States through extra efforts made by those who attend our national conventions. You cannot afford to miss the Kansas City Convention, as time and money will be worth less than those sweet songs and grand speeches from the greatest ministers of our brotherhood from all parts of the United States and across the waters. Sons and daughters who have been away from their old homes for years will find it pleasant to meet their fathers and mothers there. Brothers and sisters will be glad to meet there and recall to memory their childhood days.

Old ministers with one foot in the grave, perhaps their last convention, young ministers in the vigor of their manhood. Old schoolmates and students from the colleges of our brotherhood will be there. This should be the largest and most inspiring national convention of the Chris-

Go With Us to the National Convention at Kansas City, October 11-18.

The CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST has selected the Burlington Route over which to run its special excursion to the National Convention at Kansas City.

We have done this because this route is the most convenient for a large part of our brotherhood in Missouri and adjoining states.

Every one knows the Burlington Route; its track is firm and safe, its equipment of the very best and the territory covered by its lines is immense.

Our arrangement with them assures us of the exclusive use by the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST excursion of as many first-class chair cars as may be needed for the comfort of the members of that party.

We will leave St. Louis on Tuesday, Oct. 11, at 9 A. M., on one of their best trains and in some of their best cars. Don't forget that there will be nothing second-rate about the arrangement.

We will make connection at Hannibal with trains from the East and North and invite all who can meet us at St. Louis, Hannibal, Laclede or other points en route to join our party. Brethren who live off the line of the Burlington but who would like to join us in this excursion, either singly or in parties, are invited to write us for fuller information.

Railroad rates to Kansas City are one fare plus two dollars for the round trip from all points except that from points from which the one-way rate to Kansas City is six dollars or less, the rate will be one and one-third fare for the round trip. Tickets on sale Oct. 11, 13 and 15; good for return leaving Kansas City up to and including Oct. 20. On tickets where the rate is one fare plus two dollars there will be a joint agency fee at Kansas City of fifty cents.

Watch the columns of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELeach week for additional information, begin at once to form your parties. We will do all we can to assist in arranging for your comfort and convenience. Write to us about it.

Address W. D. Cree in care of this office.

A Pleasant Accident.

As a rule, accidents are not pleasant, especiall railroad accidents. But this one was. Understand I didn't say it was a wreck-only an accident. 1 was all my fault that it happened, and it was al the fault of the Pennsylvania Railroad Compan that it was pleasant. It was like this: I wa going to New York to catch a steamer for Europ and was making rather close connections with it The train reached Pittsburg early in the morning It was that fast train which makes only thre stops between Pittsburg and New York. I jumpe off to get breakfast in the lunch room, met a acquaintance there, and we had a pleasant tim together. I remember we remarked how foolis it was for people to be nervous for fear of get ting left on such occasions. They gulp thei food as if the house was on fire and think sure th train will leave them; but it never does. The we went forth to find our train and were told tha it had been gone about two minutes and wouldn' stop for a hundred miles. But another train o the same road was just ready to start. We sum moned the station-master and told our trouble He summoned somebody else and had him holthat train till we were ready to take it. He too! us to a high official in an upper floor of the sta tion and the high official took a list of all on possessions which we had left scattered arounin the sleeper on the departed train, including our tickets, which were in the hands of the Pul man conductor. He telegraphed instructions t the first station where the train would stop an wrote an order to the conductor of the secon train to carry us to that point. When we reache Altoona, there was a blue-coated official staudin beside the track with his arms full of our valises overcoats, hats, magazines, umbrellas, and th other etceteras of a traveler's outfit. In short, reached New York only an hour and a half late than if I had not missed the train, none of m belongings were lost, and I caught my steamer.

The beauty of it was that throughout the whol experience, nobody so much as hinted that w were idiots to get left—which we were. The seemed to assume that it was any gentleman' prerogative to miss a train once in a while an that they were there to see that no unpleasan results followed the exercise of that right. I was a genuine joy to have dealings with a set o officials who could be gentlemanly as well as busi nesslike. I thought considerably less of my ow competence as a traveler after this experience but considerably more of the employees of the Pennsylvania R. R. W. E. G.

STIFF CHURCH.

The good old epigram on ecclesiastical differeniations says that the Church of England, estabished by law in the Old Country, is divided by pinion and practice into three sections. These re the High Church with its attitudes, the Broad Church with its latitudes and the Low Church with ts platitudes. But my observation leads me to ote that there is another big party in the Anlican fold, which is by far the greatest of all. This is the Stiff Church, which is not reckoned in definite category, but exists all the same, in reat power, wealth and influence. The Low Church party is at present in doleful dumps beause of the triumphant progress of the Ritualsts. These are defiant because they are triumhant. For the same reason the High Church party is in the ascendant. It is the promoter of all the Ritualist "gymkhana." The antics of the riests who play at popery in the Protestant comnunion are, of course, identified with the very name of High Church. And where is the Broad Church party to-day? Where, indeed? It is withering away under the contempt of the nation. Yet, in the days of my boyhood it seemed about to capture the whole field of each other section. Those were the days of Charles Kingsley; of Dean Stanley; of Stopford Brooke's Church career before ne seconded to the Unitarians, and of the present Archbishop of Canterbury, when he was Headnaster of Rugby School and wrote his famous articles in "Essays and Reviews," which stamped nim as a rationalistic sceptic of the most pronounced order. But Dr. Frederick Temple became Bishop of Exeter and there was a terrible commotion among the Evangelicals, because they considered him little better than an infidel. It nas a wonderful effect on an agnostic clergyman f he is tossed up into a bishopric and into the House of Lords. He is sure to leave all his heresies behind him. Years rolled on and Dr. Temple was translated from the See of Exeter and became Bishop of London. Then in his septuagenarian period he was made Primate of all England. He s properly orthodox now; but he is neither High, Low nor Broad. Our Archbishop of Canterbury s a Stiff Churchman! "Where do you buy your tobacco?" asked the famous C. M. Birrell, Baptist minister of Liverpool (predecessor of Aked), addressing the sarcastic query to his friend, Hugh Stowell Brown, the noted pastor in those days of Myrtle Street Baptist Chapel. "Where do you buy your starch?" retorted Brown. The latter was an inveterate smoker, much to the constant distress of his friend, who wore high and very imposing collars and was as punctilious in all his manners as Brown was free and easy.

STARCHY RELIGIONISTS.

This to my mind is the chief of ecclesiastical troubles. So many people are simply rigid as if they were dipped in starch every morning! One of my young fellowstudents, when I was in college, went out one Sunday to preach and got himself most earnestly prayed for by an old deacon in the post-preaching prayer-meeting. The prayer was, "O Lord, forgive the preacher for the illustration he has been using!" And yet the unfortunate illustration was from actual life. The student told his hearers that he had been hearing of a young lady, newly married, who knew so little of housekeeping that when her husband came home from his office one evening she proudly presented him with the first specimen of her washing and ironing. To his unspeakable and mingled amusement and dismay he saw that it was one of his shirts, starched and ironed all over! As I am not preaching a sermon but only writing a familiar letter, I may be forgiven if I use this incident as really illustrating the type of the average church woman, but still more of the ordinary church woman of England to-day. Here is our difficulty: We are confronted by some few millions of religious people in this country who are stiffened into inflexibility by the possession of exclusive caste privileges, civil and religious at the same time The vast majority of church people who sway the fashion of society and really control the country are neither high, low nor broad. They are utterly indifferent about shades of doctrine. One ceremony is to them as good as another. They are merely of the church, churchy and consequently they are very much of the earth, earthy; not of the heavens, heavenly; because this affectation of superiority generates ineffable arrogance and the spiritual element is carnalized by pride, bigotry and an egotism of the grossest inflation. The preaching of apostolic truth cannot touch such haughty souls. Indeed, they will not listen to any preacher who is not a state church clergyman. The only sin which really shocks them as unpardonable is the guilt of schism, which is with them only another name for Dissent or Nonconformity. I have known the most cruel treatment suffered by some member of a churchy family who, weary and sick at heart of the whole mockery of this sham Protestantism, has boldly attended my own ministry. I have seen numerous cases of miserable persecution and of the display of abominable bigotry. Well, I may as well come out with a personal fact. I know what I am saying. I was born, cradled and educated in the very midst of Church of England society and was guilty of coming out of it because Spurgeon opened my eyes to the truth concerning baptism. I was at once myself a victim of relentless persecution of that negative kind which consists of boycotting, exclusion and every king of excommunication. And this is the kind of spirit which prevails more bitterly than ever it did. It does duty instead of fire, axe and rack. And let me say that the greatest bigots in the state church are the women. I am grieved to have to say it, but I am constrained to remark that but for the proud and cold haughtiness of the millions of the pious and uncompromising women the Church of England might be disestablished forthwith. I do not agree with any of the schemes for the extension of the franchise to women. Here in one particular and one only I totally disagree with Lady Henry Somerset and the late Miss Willard. Those two noble ladies split the Temperance party in England in twain by forcing to the front the women's suffrage movement. They did not advance the cause which they obtruded one inch, but only drove it back, while they rent the Temperance ranks irremediably. If the women of England came into political power to-morrow the vast majority of them would proceed to bolster up in the most determined manner the fabric of priestcraft which is tottering under its own condition of effeteness and decay. And it is largely owing to our women that the great and disastrous conservative reactionary wave has now for some years rolled over every in-

NO MISOGYNIST.

Let it not appear to any of my readers that I am disparaging lovely woman. On the contrary I honor the fair part of humanity far more than do those who make the blunder of hurling woman into the corrupt and degrading cockpit of strife and altercation. It seems to me that we of the unfair sex are the proper political soldiers. We ought no more to devote our delicate, refined and sensitive wives, sisters and daughters to such an avocation than to send them to war among shot and shell. And yet I am reckoned an advanced radical. And let me say that in this country many of our most advanced men are entirely opposed to woman's suffrage. Woman is not logical, but rather rhetorical. She is intuitively impulsive and commits her judgment and her reason almost entirely to her emotions and sentiments. She is perfectly adapted to control all the best and highest spheres of life. She is man's autocrat and rules him so as at the same time to leave him entirely unconscious that he is her abject slave. It seems, I dare say, foolish on the part of an Englishman to write thus against the assumption of political functions by women, seeing that this mighty empire is ruled by Queen Victoria. But she only rules the empire as your wife, I verily believe, rules you, Bro. Garrison, and as I suppose, or at any rate suspect, my wife rules me. Our Queen i: not a politician. She rules as a sentimental figurehead. She does not interfere with the affairs of the nation. When she has been thought to show some partiality for a statesman, or some dislike to a minister of state, she has somewhat suffered in public esteem for the time. A political queen would lose all the affection of the nation. I do not believe she could continue to reign. I seemed to notice when I was in America that your women ruled many of the churches, but I thought I discovered that they did so by doing nearly all the work. (I remember that when I gave a lecture anywhere the pastor always came to me at the end apologetically and handed me a fee, saying that the ladies had kept half the collection. I never made any charge and I respected the ladies far too much to demur. But the power of the American woman always impressed me. One pastor brought me all the collection, much to my astonishment. I could hardly believe it, but I was not sorry, as distances are great to travel on your continent.)

PERSONALIA.

I have been enjoying some memorable treats this summer in intercourse with fugitive American brothers and sisters. Just at this moment Prof. Haggard and wife are among us. He will be speaking to my people. Bro. Bloom from Cato, N. Y., is here too, staying in this neighborhood. We shall hear him also at some meeting. Thousands of Americans must have visited London and Paris. We enjoy the benefit of a passing visit from some. The difficulty is to keep an American on the ground here a little longer after he has been scouring some sections of Europe. The setting sun seems then to exercise for him an irresistible fascination. For some whom I hunger to see we look in vain. Where is Z. Sweeney, who told me he would certainly be here? Where are the Tyler brothers? It is good to hear that Dr. Moore may be along in the late autumn. This is really his native country, only his parents happened not to be here just when he was born. Many big Americans are preaching here this month. Dr. Amory Bradford, Dr. Reuben Thomas and Dr. Pierson are giving sermons in London. Dr. Lorimer has gone to Scotland from London after delighting great audiences. Every year we seem to hear an extra number of American speakers. There is but little difference, after all, between an eloquent American and an elequent Britisher. Eloquenee is of cosmopolitan value and oratory is a commodity of universal acceptance. When this gift is sanctified it is still the bugle-blast which startles sinners who are drifting on the way to perdition and it is still the silver trumpet which gives the signal for the opening of Paradise to the pilgrims of the night of earth's weary journey.

RUSSIA FROM A CAR WINDOW.

Russia has a well-deserved reputation for being the most expensive country in Europe for travelers. In particular, its hotels are characterized as the dearest and worst on the continent. With this latter opinion I scarcely agree. The inns of the smaller towns may be as bad as their Slavophobic detractors assert, but there are plenty of good (though dear) hotels in the cities. Railroad travel has, however, the merit of being both cheap and comfortable. The cars, which are almost all of the corridor type, are quite as comfortable as our best Pullmans and far superior to the average European coach. Strangely enough, though, even their hest cars are commonly lighted with candles. One who has secured a berth in a sleeper and also wishes bedclothes secures them from the porter for an extra fee, but most Russian travelers carry their own or do without. My reindeer furs did good service at this juncture; but at times when I looked from the car window over a rolling landscape of mingled field and forest, I pined for the bicycle which I had left with the Lapp by the Arctic Ocean as the price of the said furs. The roads are not as well made as in other European countries, but continuous good weather had brought even the dirt roads into an excellent state for wheeling. On the whole I have the impression that Russia would not be a bad place for a bicycle trip if one had luck with the weather and did not mind the magnificent distances-for it is always several hundred miles from anywhere to anywhere else in Russia. It would afford a good opportunity for seeing the rural life and the village communes at a close range.

The Russian agricultural village is unique. For a long period, while the peasants were serfs, each village constituted a little communistic group with a half patriarchial, half democratic organization and exercised minute control over its members. With the emancipation of the serfs in 1862 by Czar Alexander II. (who for this alone might well be called the modern Alexander the Great) the village commune acquired still greater importance; for it came to own the land which was allotted to the various members for tillage, subject to periodical redistribution. This system is still in vogue (although much of the land which formerly belonged to the great landlords is now held in fee simple by individual peasants) and the workings of the commune must exhibit some curious features to the student of society.

As one rides through the country on the train he sees only the shell in which the commune lives. In the midst of broad and fenceless fields is a group of low thatched hovels, scarcely distinguishable from the haystacks which dot the landscape in early August. The houses (if they can be called by that name) are set close together and the group is generally cleft by a broad, dusty, unpaved thoroughfare which is at once village street and country road. Here, as in Germany, there are few isolated farm houses. The farmers all live in villages, of which two or three are in sight at once from any elevated point of view. This characteristic at once distinguishes a Russian or German rural landscape from an American.

Fortunately the train goes slowly, so that even he who runs by the fast express may read something of the character of the country and its people. They charge you an extra rate of fare in Russia for riding on a train which makes twenty-three miles an hour, and a railroad manager from that country would have heart failure if he attempted to ride on a really fast train either in western Europe or in America. The trains do not carry dining cars, but stop often and long at buffet stations, when there is time not only to eat a hearty meal but to smoke a few after dinner clgarettes—for the Russian is the world's champion cigarette smoker. Even the stage villain, who as a type is notoriously addicted to that form of dissipation, cannot compete with the average virtuous Russian.

From St. Petersburg to Moscow is a ride of four hundred miles through the forest belt of Russia. There is but one town of any consequence on the way and the population is sparse, but it is not the desolate, dreary country which I was prepared to expect. It is, on the contrary, a very pleasant ride, if one enjoys seeing magnificent forests with occassional fields interspersed.

Arriving at Moscow, a multitude of white-aproned porters, looking rather like butchers, rush into the train before any one can get out and are ready to convey baggage to a cab for a trifling consideration, and having duly dickered with the cabman (for there is no legal restriction upon their rapacity in Moscow and it is a game of catchas catch-can) one is soon thumping over roughly paved streets into the heart of the old Russian capital. The outskirts look much like any town that is irregularly built and more irregularly paved, but the nearer one comes to the center of the city, the more does the peculiar character of the place assert itself.

No right-minded traveler will, I think, be found outside of the Kremlin within an hour after his arrival. As for myself, I could not get there quickly enough. The hotel proprietor could detain me only long enough to secure my passport (which was always the first thing done at a Russian hotel) and I was off to see this very heart of Russia.

Once upon a time, when Moscow was young and small and St. Petersburg had not yet begun to be at all, the city with its fortress, churches, palaces and residences occupied a walled position on a spot of high ground by the side of the river. As the city grew, the residences were all removed to the outlying district and a new wall built around the new quarters, while the old quarter, the Kremlin, was devoted to the buildings of the church, the army and the court. Almost everything of any importance that has happened in Russia has happened at Moscow, and all great events at Moscow have happened in the Kremlin. To be sure, everything in the country has burned down two or three times and the antiquarian has only the limited satisfaction of looking at something which was built to replace something old. But in the Kremlin, more than elsewhere in Russia, one has the sensation of being on historic ground. Just what the historic events are which come to mind in this place I will not pause to state, for the probability is that the reader knows little and perhaps cares less about Russian history, and, to tell the truth, the few things that I know about it myself I have learned rather recently.

Perhaps the best introduction to the city is to be gained by climbing the Tower of Ivan, which rises out of one of the churches in the Kremlin. No city of my acquaintance has so fascinating a bird'seye view. The four hundred and eighty churches of Moscow exhibit a vast array of glittering domes, gilded and silvered, blue with gold stars, or spirally striped with all the colors of the rainbow. The dark green of the trees mingles with the light green of the roofs, and the prevailing whiteness of the buildings gives a touch of orientalism to the scene. The buildings of the Kremlin itself, upon which one looks down from this vantage point, are in all conceivable styles of architecture-Moorish, Chinese, Byzantine, renaissance and colonial-for it has seldom been given to a Russian architect to construct a building which would be beautiful and impressive and at the same chaste and homogeneous in style.

As one descends from the tower he will be set by a throng of unofficial guides who a anxious to show him the place. They are, as rule, very troublesome, especially if the travel looks either rich or "easy." I certainly did n look the former and long practice in rebuffi vampires of their sort had enabled me to put on front which gave them very little encouragemen It is always best in dealing with these busy-bodi not to commit manslaughter except as the la resort. It is not considered good form and is see dom absolutely necessary, but any measures sho of that are entirely justifiable.

The Kremlin is commonly spoken of as the cit; del of . Moscow, but, as already indicated, it much more than a stronghold. Within its se rated walls are a palace, an armory, a barrack two monasteries and five cathedrals-a Russia "cathedral" being not the seat of a bishop or th chief church of a dioceae, but any church which has a considerable corps of clergy. In one these churches in the Kremlin the czars are bat tized and married, in one they are crowned and i one they are buried. Whatever I set out to d on any day in the way of sight-seeing, whether t go out to the Sparrow Hills, from which Napoleo viewed the city as his army was entering it, or t the Thieves' Market, or to the boulevards, som how I always wound up by going to the Kremlin It is a place from which one cannot stay awa unless he deliberately shuts his eyes and forget that he is in Moscow.

But there are really a good many interesting things in Moscow which one can see incidentally on the way to and from the Kremlin, without compromising his fidelity to the latter. The so-called Kitai Gorod, or Chinese city (which, by the way has absolutely nothing to do with China or the Chinese), is a section of the city adjoining the Kremlin and containg most of the Asiatic features of Moscow. This was the site of the city after it had outgrown its original location in the Kremlin. It, too, has a separate wall of its own and a highly picturesque wall it is, with little chapels full of pictures and candles at every gate and a holy "icon" over every archway. The Russian who passes a chapel may exhibit any one of three degrees of piety. He may enter, buy a candle and place it lighted before his favorite icon, or sacred picture; or he may pause in the street, face the chapel and bow low half a dozen times while he crosses himself with great rapidity; or he may perform his devotions with one hand as he goes by without stopping.

Not only at the gates of the Kremlin and the Kitai Gorod and the outer city wall are there pictures and icons of which the faithful must take note, but everywhere throughout the city one may see holy pictures on walls and over doors, and one can scarcely glance down any street without seeing many people performing their devotions before them. Over the Sacred Gate of the Kremlin there is an icon so holy that every one passing through removes his hat. Even strangers and unbelievers in the sanctity of the picture conform to the custom, and it used to be a penal offense to wear hat while going through the Sacred Gate. Even now such disrespect excites great indignation and I have heard one Russian teamster swear with great zeal and volubility at another who had for gotten to show proper reverence to the picture.

It takes about two days and a night to go from Moscow to Odessa, the chief city of southern Russia and the most important port on the Black Sea. I was still looking for that desolate tract of waste land which I supposed occupied a considerable portion of central Russia. At first, leaving Moscow, there are low hills green with the healthy and mature verdure of midsummer. While further north there had been fields scattered here and there through the forest, now there were patches of forest rising here and there like islands in the great rolling sea of fertile farm land. The big fields were a delight to the American eye. I have not seen their like in Europe. There were evidences that there had not been enough rain this season, but still the grain looked healthy and there was "Indian corn" to be seen-another rare sight in Europe and pleasing to the homeward bound American. There were many white fields of buckwheat, which is a national food of the Russian peasantry, and the track was often lined with sunflowers for miles. The latter are not purely decorative in this land, for sunflower seeds are a cheap and abundant staple and are much used for food by the poorest classes. Here and there a modern reaper, probably American, is seen in a field of ripe wheat and again a group of thirty or forty men and women swinging scythes in the good old-fashioned way. Women swinging scythes? Certainly. And not only that, but they work on the railway shoveling ballast on the track. Every vers: (two-thirds of a mile) along the track there is a signal man or woman, who steps on the track as soon as the train has passed and stands statuesquely holding a green flag until the next one steps out two thirds of a mile down the road.

The waste land for which I continued to look did not appear and I gradually came to the conclusion that the great Russian desert, like the great American desert, is a vanishing quantity. Almost down to the Black Sea that fertile wheat land extends with only occasionally interruptions by stretches of sandy soil like that along the valley of the Dnieper River. Though the crops are good, the dwellings of the farmers are very poor. The larger towns are well built and apparently prosperous in their commerce and manufactures, but the agricultural villages give evidence of nothing but the direst poverty; and the peasants themselves, whom one sees at the little stations, clad in sheep-skin coats and with their legs wrapped with rags and rope, seem as miserable as utter destitution can make them. It is difficult for any man to look prosperous when, in place of shoes, he wears a wad of rags tied with string on each foot.

Somewhat more than half way from Moscow to Odessa lies the important city of Kief, the ancient ecclesiastical capital of Russia and the seat of its political administration before Moscow had given its name to the Empire of Muscovy. Here I stopped for a day, but the account of this interesting visit to the oldest and most sacred monastery in Russia must be deferred and given in connection with some further observations on the Russian church.

Arriving at Odessa early in the morning there would have been ample time to catch the morning steamer for Constantinople, but my passport had not yet received the necessary visa which is required of every one who leaves the empire as proof that he is not a political suspect, an escaping prisoner or a defaulting debtor. So I must spend the morning in making a tour of the police offices of Odessa, dropping here and there a ruble to this or that official and finally issuing forth with full permission to leave Russia. I do not think the Russian police found out as much about me that morning as I found out about the Russian police. But I was not yet ready to go. I had permission to leave Russia, but I could not enter Turkey until I had seen the Turkish Consul-General and exchanged a few more rubles for his seal and signature on my passport. That done, I have two clear days to see Odessa before the departure of the next steamer across the Black Sea.

Chicago Letter.

The terrific storm that wrought such ruin on the coast of Texas reached Chicago last week, and had sufficient strength left to put many lives in peril. There were but two deaths, however, the principal damage being done to the shipping. is reported as the fiercest gale on the lake since the fated "Chicora" was lost six years ago. On the Michigan side of the lake wharves were badly damaged and small sailing crafts dashed to pieces. An old captain declared that he never saw such a monster sea form in so short a time before. The passengers on a State Street cable car were thrown into a panic by the breaking of a trolley wire over their heads. There were some amusing features; for example, a dignified and rather stout matron out on West Madison Street was caught and carried along by the gale until she was compelled to run at a lively rate for one of her years. Screaming for help, she ran into the arms a robust policeman, almost knocking him down. A boy with a push-cart, finding himself unable to stop, let go the cart and flung himself to the ground. The cart continued its journey, and when last seen was headed for one of the Chicago is honored, if honor it be, with the presence of the chief men of the great political parties. A significant fact in the present campaign is the general apathy which party leaders complain of among the voters. It is safe to assume that what they mean is a feeling of indifference toward the party. There can be no doubt whatever of the lively patriotism of the rank and file, and it is an encouraging symptom that partisanship dwindles as patriotism grows. Old war cries, phantom issues and party prejudices are no longer a profitable stock in trade. The wide dissemination of knowledge, the close study of current events and the growing habit of independent thinking give promise of a better day in our politics. And yet, it is still astonishing and amusing to see with what success the politician can trump up his "issue" and get the masses to accept it as "paramount" without much regard to the facts. Religious leaders are sometimes discouraged because of the indifference of church members. But they do not suffer in their high and holy work more than business suffers from the same cause—more than even politics suffers. If half the systematic effort to arouse the constituency of a church were made that is made to arouse the constituency of a politican, the results would astonish us. It is at this point that one of the chief advantages of evangelistic efforts kis realized. The evangelist is a specialist; he may have his faults-who hasn't?-but he knows more about his particular business than anybody else. Cultivate him, encourage him, and he will help you to keep uppermost the issue which is always paramount—that of the world's salvation.

Dr. F. W. Gunsaulus, the eloquent successor to Hillis and Swing in the pulpit of Central Church, meeting in Music Hall, has resigned his position as president of Armour Institute, to take effect February 1st, 1901. It has been reluctantly accepted, and it is given as the reason for its acceptance, that Dr. Gunsaulus will devote his entire time to the establishment of the church upon a broader, every-day basis. Since its beginning, this great church has been little but a Sunday crowd, gathered for worship an hour. As Dr. Gunsaulus says, "We meet once a week, renew acquaintance and have a good social time, and that is all there is until the next Sunday." That is decidedly unsatisfactory to any earnest servant of Jesus Christ; and yet, of how many churches is it not true? Music Hall is to be torn down and the great department store of Marshall Field &

Co. is to be extended over the site. The church will seek a location elsewhere on Washington Street, probably in a new hall to be erected chiefly for its uses. The plan upon which it is purposed to conduct the church hereafter is institutional. The preacher says: "We desire to attract all the people we can, and have every one feel that we want them to be one of us. We want a large church for down-town work, to be open at all times." There is no reason, to speak perfectly plain, except the lack of gumption, why the Disciples of Christ should not have had one or more such churches in successful operation by this time. The way in which we have demonstrated conclusively our incapacity for large things in the great cities is a perpetual and apparently incurable humiliation.

Dr. E. S. Ames, the newly chosen pastor of Hyde Park Church, is expected to take charge on the first of October. It is reported that he intends returning to the pastorate and abandoning the work of a teacher for the sake of our churches. We hope this is true. Dr. H. L. Willett is supplying the pulpit for September. The pastor of the First Church has resigned and will probably quit October 1st, devoting his time to the interests of the Christian Century Company, popular lectures, pulpit supply, church dedications, etc. W. B. Taylor is making a final effort to pay off the debt of the North Side Church before he quits this barren field. Union Church has not yet found a successor to J. H. O. Smith.

B. B. Tyler's Letter.

Leon is the capital of Decatur County, Ia., and is only about a dozen miles from the Missouri state The town is in the midst of a fine agricultural region. It is a typical Western country town. A gentleman told me a few days ago that the vield of corn in the county has reached, in some instances, one hundred bushels per acre. This, of course, is unusual. But little corn comparatively is shipped to the markets. Generally it is fed to cattle and hogs. Good farm land can be bought now in this region at a low price. I was told by a reliable party that a farm adjoining Leon of three hundred acres well improved can be bought for ten thousand dollars. Upon being questioned he said that nine thousand dollars cash would buy it. This land, he said, will rent for probably two dollars and fifty cents an acre. It does not need a shrewd business eye to see that the purchase of this farm is a good investment-assuming that the statements here quoted are reliable; and I see no reason for doubting them. The surface of the country here is more broken than is usual in Iowa. The scenery from the window of my room as I write is very fine.

The principal churches in the town are Baptist, Methodist, Presbyterian and Christian. There is no Roman Catholic Church in Leon. Some miles from town there is an Irish settlement and a church owning allegiance to Pope Leo XIII. There are small Advent and Mormon Churches in Leon. Lamoni, a Mormon headquarters, is in this county about fifteen miles distant. In fact, Lamoni is THE headquarters for the "Josephite Mormons" or the "Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latterday Saints." A son of Joseph Smith, the original Mormon prophet, is a citizen of this place. I have heard that "he is a better prophet than was his father." The "Josephite Mormons" are opposed to polygamy. Mormons of this variety seem to be about as well thought of here as any people. The uniform testimony is that they are good citizens and good neighbors. I have been told that Mormons are teachers in the public schools in Leon. The county treasurer is a Mormon elder. Usually the people when speaking of the Mormons use the words "Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints," or simply "Latter-day Saints." Their printing house is located at Lamoni. A grandson of Joseph Smith, Frederick M. Smith, is the editor of the Lamoni Chronicle. The "Saints" in Lamoni do not like the Salt Lake City "Saints" a little bit. Mormonism is a power to be reckoned with in the United States. R. B. Neal, of Grayson, Ky., and others who are fighting this system, are not engaged in a bout with a windmill. This remark applies especially to the Utah Mormons.

There is a great congregation of the Christian Church in Leon. In some regards it is the leading church in the town. In numbers it is as strong as either of the other congregations. An unusual number of young people belong to this church. The biblical intelligence of the members of the Christian Church will not, to say the least, suffer in comparison with others.

This church is peculiarly fortunate in its pastor. His name is Castor—R. W. Castor. He is a yourg man and is a graduate of Drake University. His character is above reproach. He has the confidence of his own people and of the people generally. He is intelligent and good. In his care of the church he is diligent, prudent, wise and unselfish. He has a care for the spiritual health of the people. If were Bishop and had the location of preachers in my hands I would appoint R. W. Castor to the Leon "charge!"

This town is in a peculiar spiritual condition. An emotional revival struck the place last spring. A reaction has followed and the pastors complain of small congregations and a painful lack of interest in spiritual things. The result is natural. The principle underlying a revival of this character is the same as that of a real estate boom. Is a real estate boom good for the business interests of a community? Not as a rule. For information inquire of the citizene of almost any place that has had an experience. Here and there, now and again, a church or a community receives benefit from the emotional revival; but such congregations and places are exceptional.

The singing in our church in Leon is worthy of mention in this place. It is my kind! I could not get enough of it; and one of the best features of it is the fact that the members of the choir apparently do not know that their singing is good!

When I was in Iowa last April I called attention to the fact that there is an infidel propaganda among the Fohemians. This organization, it is said, encourages self-murder. It also encourages, so it is affirmed, the murder of such members of their families as are no longer useful on account of illness or age. It is said that the members of the organization to which I refer practice in this regard what Ingersoll advocated. I had no sooner returned to the state than I heard again of this society and its work. This matter is of especial importance because reputable men assert that a professor in the State University is in sympathy with this atheistic movement.

Desiring to hear both sides I addressed a letter of inquiry to the president of the Iowa State University asking what there was in the charges against Prof. Shimek. In the absence of President McLean the "acting private secretary of the president" replied. He said, speaking of Prof Shimek:

"I think a wrong impression has gone abroad in regard to his religious character. The controversy receives but little attention here, because it is generally felt to be a church quarrel. I mean by that that the society to which he belongs has gained the bitter opposition of the Catholic Church, partly because it has drawn many of its members from that church, which strictly prohibits secret societies; partly, too, because it is the outgrowth of a society in Bohemia which has considered the Catholic Church responsible for Bohemia's nonadvancement in the political and social world. Prof. Shimek himself has publicly disavowed infidelity, and has publicly stated that the paper on which he is an associate editor, and which is the organ of the C. S. P. S., has not the intention of teaching infidelity. The professor is not known among his associates as an aggressive infidel or atheist; indeed, his religious belief, or non-belief, has never attracted much attention. His connection with this paper has nothing whatever to do with the university, and we have no copies in the office of the attacks made upon him or his replies. So little attention is paid to it here that I had to interview several professors before I could find one who knew anything about it."

The letters "C. S. P. S.," I ought to explain, stand for a society whose name in English is "Bohemian Slavonic Benevolent Society."

Dr. Woitishek, of Cedar Rapids, explains to me that "the word Slavonic is used because the Bohemians are a part of the Slavonic race." The Doctor also says that "the society has over 10,000 members in the United States, is a fraternal life insurance society, but socially it has become virtually a purely infidel society, having for its prime object the total destruction of all religious sentiment among our people."

Dr. Woitishek says "our people" because he is himself a Bohemian. He ought to know what the "C. S. P. S." is, having been a member of the organization. He says that the paper of which Prof. Shimek is an associate editor "never prints any article in its pages that would have the least sympathy with Christianity. It is thoroughly one-sided—infidel, really atheistic."

Dr. Woitishek is not a member of any church.

He was an atheist; he now believes in the teach ings of the Christ.

The question before the people of Iowa is: I Prof. Shimek a suitable person to be a member of the teaching force or faculty of the State University? Dr. Woitishek says that Prof. Shimel "aids in poisoning the minds of our Bohemian people by reading such an infidel paper and also in going to their beer dances and participating in their infidel ceremonies and really making brutes of our people." There are others in Iowa who agree with the Doctor in this connection, Catholics and Protestants.

Mr. Sheldon's Criticism of England.

Assuming the correctness of the condensed report of Mr. Sheldon's account of his English experiences referred to by Bro. Durban in the last issue of the Christian-Evangelist, I have two remarks to make concerning it.

1. If Mr. Sheldon affirms that he was insulted by drunken English soldiers without rebuke or protest from onlookers, I accept his statement of fact as closing the controversy on that point, for I believe in Mr. Sheldon's veracity. But I beg leave to assure him that this experience of his was quite exceptional. I spent sixteen years under the Union Jack, eleven years in the Australiar Colonies and five in England, and I was never insulted by an Englishman of any kind. The Engglish are polite and courteous or they are nothing.

2. As to the alleged prevalence of the drink habit, in all representations on this subject it must be borne in mind that there are two Englands, as there are two Americas. There is an England that drinks, and in a man's first hasty trip through the country he is apt to conclude that is this about all the England there is, but more extensive observation seriously modifies this conclusion and reveals a sober, non-bibulous England. If my own personal testimony is worth anything I must say that during my sixteen years' experience in New South Wales, Victoria, South Australia, Tasmania, New Zealand and New Britain, not a single person ever put liquor before me to drink, and I have yet to see the first British soldier drunk. Mr. Sheldon must have been unfortunate in the J. J. HALEY. company he kept.

REMARKS ABOUT NOURISHING FOOD.

"A physician's wife, Mrs. Dr. Landon, gave me a packet of Grape Nuts about a year ago, with the remark that she was sure I would flud the food very beneficial, both for my own use and for my patients. I was particularly attracted to the food, as at that time the weather was very hot and I appreciated the fact that the Grape Nuts required no cooking.

"The fool was deliciously crisp, and most inviting to the appetite After making use of it twice a day for three or four weeks, I discovered that it was a most wonderful invigorator. I used to suffer greatly from exhaustion, headaches and depression of spirits. My work had been very trying at times and indigestion had set in.

"Now I am always well and ready for any amount of work, have an abundance of active energy and cheerfulness and mental poise. I have proved to my entire satisfaction that this change has been brought about by Grape-Nuts food.

"The fact that it is predigested is a very desirable feature. I have had many remarkable results in feeding Grape-Nuts to my patients, and I cannot speak too highly of the food. My friends constantly comment on the change in my appearance. I have gained nine pounds since beginning the use of this food." Eleanor Miller, Trained Medical and Surgical Nurse, 515 Jeff. Texas Letter.

Texas is under a great, dark shadow. Never in its history or in the history of the land at large have we been called on to face so terrible a caamity as that which has befallen Galveston and the coast country near the ill-fated city. On Saturday, September 9, the winds and waves combined and soon the island, only about ten feet above sea level, was completely submerged, the water varying in depth from three to fifteen feet. Fremont Hotel, the highest point in the city, had three feet of water in the building, while the lower portions were buried beneath waves five times that deep. And during this struggle with the water the wind was blowing at the rate of ninety miles an hour, the two making a power for the destruction of life and property almost irresisti-The 40,000 people of the beautiful city thus in a few hours lost not only their homes and their business, but from 5,000 to 8,000 of them lost their lives. Not a building in the entire city escaped injury, and perhaps not a single individnal came out unhurt. The property loss is estimated at $25,000,000, but the complete list of the dead can never be given. Thousands of human bodies, unidentified on account of the extreme heat, were hurriedly buried at sea, and there are thousands of others crushed beneath fallen walls, whose mangled bodies, when found, will never be identified. And sad to say, the sea would not keep her dead, but in many cases hurled them back on the shore, and they had to be burned. Under these circumstances it will be impossible ever to have a comple list of the lost. But many who are left are worse than dead-they are raving maniacs. Strong men and women saw their loved ones swept into the deep, or crushed beneath falling stones, brick and lumber, and the awful vision robbed them of reason, and now the eyes glare, and they laugh when you speak to them of their experience during those fearful

The horrible picture beggars description. No language can possibly paint it. The mind staggers in its attempt to grasp it, and even the wildest imagination cannot conceive of so frightful a reality.

But I must speak of one other feature. Such scenes bring out both the best and the worst in humanity. No sconer had the sad news gone abroad than assistance began to pour in. It came from the North and the South and the East and the West and from across the sea, for England has been a liberal helper, so that perhaps $1,500,000 would not overestimate the offering, and still it comes. This shows us the true inwardness of the human heart, and proves that man is not altogether bad; this is the only silver lining on that black cloud.

How I wish I could stop here, but I cannot. Over against this fine picture I must place another. It must have been conceived by Satan and wrought out by demons. It is this: While good men were doing all in their power to rescue the living and bury the dead, bad ones took advantage of the opportunity to rob them of everything valuable on their persons, and in many cases cut off the ears and swollen fingers for the jewelry they wore. These ghouls had a short reign, for orders were issued by the authorities to shoot them down like dogs, and it was done.

Many of the smaller towns and the whole country near Galveston suffered greatly. A. J. Bush, at Alvin, escaped with his family, but his house was injured and its contents ruined. Others of our preachers, and many of our members lost everything, and some of them lost their lives.

J. B. Haston, our Galveston pastor, was out of the city with his family and thus escaped, but seven of his little church of 140 members were lost; the building, strange to say, was not seriously injured.

Some men are born editors and others have editorial honors thrust upon them, and your correspondent belongs to the latter class. A little more than a year since I suffered myself to be persuaded to accept the business management of the Christian Courier; but an experience of three months convinced me that with my large pastorate of a thousand members, this was a mistake and I resigned. But again these same directors and stockholders, like the unfortunate widow, will not let me alone. In a meeting, Aug. 31, ignoring my wishes in the case, they again persuaded me not only to take the business management, but also editorial control of the paper, and so it is now with all its weight resting on my alreadywell-burdened shoulders. But as it comes so persistently, and wholly without my seeking, and since we must have it in our Texas work, I have concluded that it is sent of God, and what can I do but accept it and do the best I can for it, trusting in God and good men to stand by me in the arduous undertaking.

Cincinnati Letter.

As the perspective lengthens on his life the Christian nations more and more see how great a man was David Livingstone. Already his name is to the schoolboy one of the score of great ones. Many have read short accounts of his career in Africa and a few some of his own books, but until of late his personal correspondence has not been available to the masses of readers. His friend, Dr. Gordon Blaikie, has issued the best book on Livingstone ever published. It corrects many erroneous impressions of the great missionary's career, for he was, first and last, a missionary. That was the golden thread of his purpose. He discovered, wrote treatises on science, fought political and diplomatic battles simply because they stood in the line of his one great enterprise -missions. It illustrátes, not his abandonment of the cause he first espoused, but that he was one of those versatile geniuses who could do all of these things in prosecuting that one cause.

Livingstone was a great man. He was not satisfied to stop with even the successful conduct of a single mission when all inner Africa was an unblazed forest. He was not content to convert a single tribe when the slave trade was destroying scores of others. Here was his monumental work. The world has not yet seen the fullness of his accomplishment. Had he done all he did at the head of an army the plaudits of his fellows would have never ceased. But his sword was that of peace. His less spectacular conquest was none the less effective.

But Livingstone was greatest in his failures. They were not without number. Like most heroic souls he failed but to succeed. It often seemed that a moment had dashed his whole life of sacrifice into oblivion, yet he did not despair, for he had unfailing faith in the victory of righteousness.

This book of Dr. Blaikie's is fascinating and inspiring. It enlarges the soul of its reader. It is a missionary classic. The Students' Campaign Committee has included it in the most excellent library it is sending out. Drop the Foreign Society a card for particulars.

THAT "REIGN OF LAW."

Perhaps Mr. Allen has shown a little iconoclasm but the experience of a multitude of young men will justify him. Perhaps he does not relate historical facts, but the canons of fiction writing do not demand that he should. If he relates real or possible experience he is writing within the bounds of literary propriety. David is not alone in his troubles. Every young minister should read this book as a sort of warning. He will not need to accept it. Most young men are able to weigh facts and reasons. They are sometimes injured forever by being "molded" mentally rather than cultivated. Review the last few pages of the book now that first impressions have lost their fever and they will not seem so entirely unwholesome. David finds the God of love. The sequel may not show him entirely orthodox, but it cannot show him aught but religious. We wish, however, that the author might have discovered to him the matchless life of the Man of Nazareth.

THE SCHOOL FOR PASTORAL HELPERS

is exciting some considerable interest, both in and out of the brotherhood. The problem of the down-town church is one of the commanding questions and many see in this movement a great help toward its solution. Prof. Henderson, of the University of Chicago, urges that training as nurses should be an accompaniment. The problem of the big church may also look here for help. The lady helper will be a great aid in wielding numbers. Why is it any less expedient to pay workers for Sunday-school and charity work than to pay another worker to preach from the pulpit? It will further organization, which is an indispensable factor in any live and effective effort. The management are proceeding with wise caution. Only a limited class will be received this year.

Ministerial Association.

The thirty-seventh annual meeting of the Ministerial Association of Eastern Ohio, was held Sept. 4-6 in the little city of Canton, within whose limits is the modest and pleasant home of William McKinley, President of the United States.

The Ministerial Association of the Disciples of Christ of Eastern Ohio is probably the strongest and best of its kind among the Disciples. In the thirty-seven years since its organization in Alliance it has never failed to meet in annual session, and for the first fifteen years of its history its meetings were held twice a year. It has kept a record of every meeting and every session from the beginning. Its annual programs have always been good and sometimes exceptionally strong. Among its members have been those who stood in the first rank among the pioneer Disciple preachers. Its membership has been annually recruited from succeeding ranks until its history, counted by decades, contains the experiences and the peculiarities of four generations of preachers. In its earliest membership were such men as Andrew Burns, A. B. Green, J. W. Lanphear, J. J. Moss, A. S Hayden, Isaac Errett, Silas E. Shepherd, W. A. Belding and J. H. Jones. These and many others of their generation have passed away, except Dr. Belding and Harrison Jones, who still linger far beyond the fourscore limit. H. W. Ever est was its first vice-president; B. A. Hinsdale, one of its ablest members, and John M. Atwater, both radical and conservative-these and others have made its work valuable to its membership inidvidually and to the congregations they have represented. Its total membership from the beginning has included over four hundred names. No names are dropped from its rolls except by request or for immoral conduct, and its members are found in heathen lands and in nearly every state of the nation, in Canada, in Europe and in the islands of the sea.

At the Canton meeting letters were read from J. W. James, J. H. Mohorter, C. J. Tanner, C. H. Strawn, Levi Marshall, C. L. Morrison, M. P. Havden, R. M. Marshall and Dr. W. A. Belding. from the states of Ohio, Massachusetts, Minnesota, Missouri, New York and Manitoba.

The program of the Canton meeting was a strong one. The following persons performed the work given them honestly, ably and sometimes brilliantly: Modern Psychic Phenomena, Alanson Wilcox, Cleveland, O.; "The Ecumenical Missionary Conference," W. W. Sniff, Cleveland, O.; Elements of Success in Evangelistic Meetings, P. H. Welsheimer, Millersburg, O.; The Problem of the Country Church, Alcinous Baker, Braceville, O.; "The Old Testament under Fire," A. M. Chamberlain, Alliance, O.; The Book of Daniel, M. L. One session was given to the pioneers and Lathrop Cooley, for fifty years a preacher, and J. H. Jones, for seventy-two years a preacher, occupied the time to the pleasure and profit of all. Amoug the Disciples such an event was never known before.

Bro. G. A. Hoffmann's address was counted among the very best and the association felt highly honored by his presence.

For the first time in his long ministry Robert Moffett was unable to be present and preside on account of infirmity. Ugly rheumatism compelled him to remain at home. There were forty preachers present, nearly all of whom are members of the association. The discussions were bright but the spirit of the meeting Christian, and all passed pleasantly and on the ascending scale to the end.

The next meeting will be held in Medina, O., beginning on the first Tuesday in September, 1901.

The officers elected are: President, A. Baker, Braceville, O.; vice-president, E. A. Bosworth, Morristown, O.; corresponding secretary and treasurer, F. M. Green, Kent, O. The new program will soon be under way. Nearly every preacher present took some part in the program. It was a good meeting every way and I only regret that space will not allow me to express myself as I would like to concerning each participant. The letter from Dr. Belding made a profound impression, and coming from one who for fifty years has never faltered or wearied, it had almost the interest and force of an apostolic letter. I cannot close this letter better than to give it in full. Its admonitions and exhortations are worthy of the attention of every preacher:

TO THE BRETHREN OF THE MINISTERIAL ASSOCIA-TION OF EASTERN OHIO ASSEMBLED - Greeting: Grace, mercy and peace from our kind Heavenly Father and his Son our blessed Savior. "Have salt among yourselves and be at peace one with another."

A letter of notice and invitation to be present at your annual gathering in Canton, Ohio, September 4, 1900, was duly received and gladly welcomed.

It carried me back in memory to the numerous meetings of former years and the sweet and joyous fellowship in which so many of us participated and others who will never again respond to earthly calls, but "when the roll is called up yonder," I trust we shall all be there.

It is with deep regret that I am compelled to say, if means of travel would permit, my feeble health will prevent my being present with you in body, yet in spirit I shall be there, joying and beholding your steadfastness in the faith and fellowship of the Spirit, which shall tend to further you in the divine life and better prepare you to help in the prosecution of the work which Christ the rightful lawgiver has committed to his church.

Dear brethren in Christ, "preach the Word," which is God's power to save the world Don't speculate about matters which to believe will neither admit a man into heaven nor shut him out.

The religious world is moving, and in the right direction. Stick to the Book. Press the claims of Jesus for the union of his people, in harmony with his recorded prayer in the 17th of John. A great work has been done and a far greater is yet to be accomplished if the Church of Christ is faithful and true to the trust committed to it.

While I have been absent from the meetings of the association for a number of years, I have continued to feel a lively interest in it and have marked with pleasure the apparent growth and increasing zeal of the brotherhood in Ohio and especially in the northeastern portion of it.

What wonderful changes God has wrought among the people since my short term of labor in the Master's vineyard! May the glorious work go on until the precious truth shall triumph and "the kingdoms of this world shall become the kingdom of our Lord and of his Christ;" when Jesus himself shall come in person to take his re deemed army into the presence of his Father and introduce them, saying: "Here Father, am I, and the children whom thou hast given me."

While it seems to me now a matter of doubt While it seems to me now a matter of whether I shall ever be with you again in your earthly convocations, yet, dear brethren, I ask an interest in your prayers that my faith may not fail and that I may be able in truth to say: "Not fail and that I may be able in truth to say: "Not my will, but thine, O God, be done." May the love of Christ that passeth all understanding dwell in you and manifest itself to all, is my prayer. Farewell.

Your brother in Christ,

W. A. BELDING. 2141 Fifth Ave., Troy, N. Y., Aug. 22, 1900.

I hope all the members of the association who were unable to be present will consider this brief report of the meeting at Canton as a love-token to them through me, their long-time corresponding secretary.

Shorthand. Learn

Knowledge of Shorthand and Typewriting will Enable You to be Self-Sustaining.

The Missouri Shorthand College of St. Louis. Mo., is one of the Leading Shorthand Institutions in the United States.

Persons intending the acquirement of shorthand and typewriting should select a responsible school. otherwise their time and money are wasted.

As success in shorthand is largely dependent on the teacher as well as pupil, it is absolutely necessary that instructors should be practical shorthand writers, and no others are competent to teach. Benn Pitman system taught.

The Principal of "The Missouri shorthand College" is John H. Schofield, the well-known journalist and shorthard writer, and member of the National Shorthand Writers' Association. In order to show that he is a practical and recognized exponent of shorthand, reference letters are herewith published from leading educators:

Prof. E. Benjamin Andrews, now Chancellor of Nebraska University, and recently Superintendent of Chicago schools, comments on his character and ability as follows:

Board of Education,
Office of Superintendent of Schools,
Shiller Building,
Chicago, Feb. 21, 1900.
Mr. John H. Schofield is well and favorably known to me as the successful director of a large shorthand college in Providence, R. I. I consider him not only one of the most expert practical shorthand writers whom I have ever known, but also an upright, honorable and perfectly trustworthy gentleman.

E. BENJ ANDREWS,
Superintendent of Schools.

Commenting on Mr. Schofield's ability and character, President E. G. Robinson, of Brown University. Providence, R. I., contributes the following:

Brown University, Providence, R. I.
I have known Mr. John H. Schofield for years as stenographic reporter for the Previdence Journal.
His work has given special satisfaction to all parties concerned. His character as a Christian genileman has also commanded respect, and I take pleasure in commending him to the confidence and good will of all with whom he may meet or with whom he may have business relations E. G. ROBINSON. President Brown University, Brother Fabrician, of La Salle College, Philadelphia, Pa., adds the following testimonial

La Salle College, Philadelphia, Pa.

Mr. John H. Schofield: My dear Sir—It gives me much pleasure to say a timely word to bear witness to your character as a man, and your ability as a journalist and shorthand writer. I hope and pray that your efforts, in whatever channel you may choose to direct them, will be rewarded with the measure of success which your talents, your energy and your accomplishments must win. You are, however, too well and favorably known to need this note or recognition from your very sincere and devoted friend,

BRO. FABRICIAN.

BRO. FABRICIAN.

Those so situated that they cannot attend school sessions, taught by mail, as Principal John H. Schofield has had gratifyin success by this method of teaching. Mail students who will devote two hours daily to practice, cannot fail to obtain a general knowledge of shorthand in twenty weeks. This is a short time to acquire a proression that will enable persons to become self-supporting. Those who attend school generally graduated in about sixteen weeks, but this depends largely on the ability and general knowledge of the pupil.

As a knowledge of shorthand is of no pratical utility unless able to sp ll and compose correctly, students deficient in these lines are taught without extra charge. Shorthand and typewriting furnishes lucrative, as well as pleasant employment for both sexes, but more especially for young ladies, as there are always positions for those who are capable and competent.

Gained the Victory.

Our pastor, E. M. Johnson, has just closed an eighteen months' pastorate with us and leaves now for Cotner University to attend school. His stay with us has been a most profitable one. While he came and first labored under adverse circumstances, yet we can now see what carnest, consecrated work will do. At the beginning of his work here we had a $425 debt on our building and lots. We began to raise the money to pay off that debt. At times some of us got somewhat discouraged, but he urged us on, and by his untiring efforts and faith in Christ every dollar of that debt is provided for. When he came our membership was but 47, at present we have 102. This, of course, was partly due to a revival last winter, when we united our efforts with an evangelist. As Bro. Johnson leaves us he has the good will and entire sympathy of the whole congregation. We would not part with him were it not for his school work. We heartily recommend him to the Christian brotherhood as a strong, earnest, consecrated, Christian man. May God bless him and his good wife in their new work.

We are looking for a good man to engage with us as pastor. BERT WILSON.

Does the Work

No Surgical Operation, No Pain, Trifling Expense—A Simple, Harmless Remedy, but it Does the Work.

There are some people who have piles as frequently and regularly as other people have colds.

Any little bowel trouble will bring them on, any extra exertion, as in lifting, will produce them, and in fact will often appear without any apparent provocation. Piles, however, are much more serious than a cold, as the tendency is always to grow worse until the trouble becomes deep seated and chronic, or develops into some fatal rectal disease.

While there are many pile remedies which give relief, yet there is but one which not only gives instant relief but at the same time makes a permanent cure, and that is the well-known Pyramid Pile Cure.

This remedy is composed of simple, harmless vegetable ingredients, but combined so effectively and act so promptly and thoroughly that it cures every form of piles whether itching, blind, bleeding or protruding.

In long standing cases the Pyramid Pile Cure has proven to be the only certain cure except a surgical operation, and its advantages over an operation are many, as it is painless, cause: no delay or interference with daily occupation and last but not least, it is cheaper than any surgical operation could pos-

Forty-four auxiliaries failed to send their reports for fourth quarter in time for state convention at Moberly. Hurry them in, also the money to its proper destination, or you will fail to be counted in the state reports that go to national headquarters, and even a few dollars may affect our rank among other states this year. ranked No. 7 last year; let us get back again and steadily climb until we reach our rightful place, first. We can do it. Why not? It is for you, my Missouri sisters, to decide. Will you hold on in a half hearted manner to this work, or will you work, plan and pray for it as Christ's cause demands of those who claim his name for themselves? Study our text-book, the Missionary Tidings, so you may be well informed and ready to meet all kinds of arguments in regard to what we are doing, and study the Bible so you may be able to quote our authority for doing it.

Our state meeting at Moberly will be over ere this reaches you. Are you satisfied with the revelations made there? Will you promise him that next year shall show a different result so far as it lay in your power to change it? If 3,000 women will make and keep this promise we shall have a convention next year that will cause joy in heaven because we, who were almost lost to his service, shall have found ourselves and our talents.

Missouri Bible-school Notes.

Rally Day is here and it will help your school to hold one. We will very gladly help on by mailing you a program, but better, write B. L. Smith, Y. M. C. A. Bldg., Cincinnati, and get as many as you may wish and have your school hold a Rally.

The Pettis County meeting at East Broadway, Sedalia, was first-class, only the rain cut off many delegations. F. L. Cook was continued as president, while J. N. Dalby has been secretary from the beginning. The reports were good, the interest fine.

The Ralls County meeting was unusually good. The Perry people had made such thorough preparation that none were slighted. The dinners and suppers were served in the "horticultural hall." The reports deserve to be commended by all. W. D. McCully and C. S. Brooks had economically managed the finances of the year. The people should not hesitate to support such work. The giving was generous indeed: The following schools pledged their apportionments in full, while some paid then and there Perry, Centre, New London, Ocean Wave, Union, Liberty and Pleasant

S. G. Newton, of Ralls, has made us the best individual offering excepting Miss Susie Browning's bequest. His giving last year, amounting to $95, with which we hope to do some special work at Villa Ridge in Franklin County.

The Salisbury Rally was the first of the fall. The program was good, the music was fine, the interest splendid and the day delightfully hot. All the interests of the church and school were quickened, much to the pleasure of K. W. White and his good Christian wife, while the giving to our work was prompt and willing.

The Howard County meeting at Ashland was held in the newly furnished church, well attended by the delegations and presided over by S. G. Clay. Last year's work was so good that funds were easily raised for this. Fayette, Mt. Moriah, Pleasant Green, New Franklin will give to our work their apportionments, but Ashland pays in full right now. A. N. Liudsay is doing fine work for the brethren and they appreciate him very much as do Franklin and Armstrong also.

M. H. Wood closed his meeting at Bryant, Douglas, with 28 baptisms, a new Bible-school and church house on the way. As a faithful evangelist the brethren delight to honor him and God will bless him.

At Bellview, Phelps, Bro. R. B. Havener found the closed house of God and left them with all departments of the church going and a brother called to serve them for a year. House had been closed since January first. This is another feature of our work, revive the dead as well as the dying and the Elder Brother is blessing us in it. Sixteen additions at Bellview.

At Clinton I was given a good audience in the morning, but compelled to call in the night appointment by sickness. Bro. J. J. Lockhart, one of the best of friends to our cause, was anxious that I represent the work here and that the brethren should co-operate with us once more. giving me his time and salary, so that I regretted exceedingly my inability to help them that night. The school gave us a pledge to help on and thus the day was made one of our best.

The cards for the second quarter will go out this week and your ready response is desired, for by this means we seek to keep even with the H. F. DAVIS.

A New Educational Movement.

During this month when the doors of a hundred thousand schools are opening to receive the youth of the land, the mothers and fathers and ambitious young people who must stay at home are hungering for educational opportunities. They realize that, other things being equal, position, usefulness and happiness are in proportion to culture, and they long for some practical plans that will help them to turn their spare moments into school and college terms. Complex modern life and the battle for material existence leave the world no more of the old-time leisure for mental and spiritual culture. And so everywhere people are hungering for intellectual food and craving mental stimulus and would be grateful for some plan that would offer guidance and help. These reflections came to me forcibly during a delightful outing this year at Bay View, the great summer educational center in Northern Michigan. I found there and studied a new educational movement which I feel sure a great many readers of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST will be glad to know about.

A few years ago Mr. J. M. Hall, a young lawyer in the city of Flint, Mich., was at the head of a large young people's Bible class and in his desires to give the members a better prospect in life he established a reading circle, which soon became widely known. Others from far and wide began calling for his plans, and to meet the growing demand for self-culture plans, the Bay View circle was established. Mr. Hall still remains at the head of the work, whose headquarters also remain at Flint, Mich., but without courting publicity the organization has not only spread over this country but has entered Canada, Germany, China and the Hawaii Islands. Mr. Hall's genius in conducting club studies is everywhere being recognized by the women's clubs, of which more than fifty have in the past few months adopted his course. The plans are simple, but there is intelligent system and history, literature and travel are deftly joined in a reading journey of the most delightful character. I learned that last year the members were on a study tour of Russia and Holland and that they will spend the coming year in England, Ireland and Scotland.

During the summer I often met at the annual gatherings at Bay View the members from many states and always heard from them the most enthusiastic reports. The members were mostly, like myself, bread-winners, and the course has been

This is not the place to enter into a scription of the plans of the Bay View readi course-a card addressed to Mr. Hall will alway secure them. I am concerned more in reviving hope of the busy women and aspiring young p ple to again take up the pleasures of books a study, for which this reading course seems to: to offer the best practical plans.

The Old Canoe.

Where the rocks are gray and the shore is steep, And the waters below look dark and deep, Where the rugged pine, in its lonely pride, Leans gloomily over the murky tide; Where the reeds and rushes are long and lank, And the weeds grow thick on the winding bank; Where the shadow is heavy the whole day through,

There lies at its moorings the old canoe.

The useless paddles are idly dropped, Like a seabird's wings that the storm has lopped, And crossed on the railing, one o'er one, Like the folded hands when the work is done; While busily back and forth between, The spider stretches his silvery screen, And the solemn owl with his dull "too whoo," Settles down on the side of the old canoe.

The stern half sunk in slimy wave, Rots slowly away in its living grave, Hote slowly away in its living grave, And the green moss creeps o'er his dull decay, Hiding its mothering dust away, Like the hand that plants o'er the tomb a flower, Or the ivy that mantles the falling tower; While many a blossom of loveliest hue Springs up oe'r the stern of the old canoe.

The currentless waters are dead and still, But the twilight wind plays with the boat at will, And lazily in and out again It floats the length of the rusty chain, Like the weary march of the hands of time, That meet and part at the noontide chime, And the shore is kissed at each turning anew, By the dripping bow of the old canoe.

Oh, many a time, with ceaseless hand, I have pushed it away from the pebbly strand, And paddled it down where the stream runs quick,
Where the whirls are wild and the eddies are thick,

And laughed as I leaned o'er the rocking side And looked below in the broken tide, To see that the faces and boats were two, That were mirrrored back from the old canoe.

But now, as I lean o'er the crumbling side, And look below at the sluggish tide, The face that I see there is graver grown, And the laugh that I hear is a sober tone, And the hands that lent to the light skiff wings Have grown familiar with sterner things: But I love to think of the hours that sped As I rocked where the whirls their white spray shed.

Ere the blossom waved, or the green grass grew, O'er the moldering stern of the old canoe. -Albert Pike.

Washington and Napoleon.

L. MARION ROBINSON.

Washington was solid and conservative; Napoleon was dashing and brilliant. Washington was a toiler and a plodder; Napoleon was a genius. Washington excelled Napoleon as a man of integrity and moral grandeur. Washington was modest, retired and dignified in all his conduct; Napoleon was Washington egotistical and self-assertive. devoted his fortune and talents to the struggle for independence; Napoleon laid his genius on the altar of selfish ambition and pride. Washington was an unselfish patriot; Napoleon was an ambitious leader. Washington desired to serve America; Napoleon sought to conquer Europe. Washington was grieved when he found there was a movement on foot to make him king; Napoleon accepted the dictatorship and became emperor with gladness. Washington modestly refused to accept a third term as President; Napoleon had to be forced out of official position in France. Washington died in honor, beloved and respected throughout the world; Napoleon died in exile unappreciated by his country. Washington's work still stands and will stand as long as history endures; Napoleon's work was brilliant but transcient. Victory perched upon the Stars and Stripes under Washington in the end; defeat crushed the Man of Destiny at Waterloo. Washington was considerate of his soldiers; Napoleon was ready to sacrifice the lives of his men, if, in doing it, he could exalt his station and power. Such is the contrast of an unselfish life devoted to the service of fellowmen and an ambitious one devoted to the glorification of self.

The test of true greatness is Christlike-As men approach and reflect the character of Christ they are great. In all the qualities that we find to admire in Washington we find them approaching the character of Christ. Napoleon may have been a greater military genius, but he did not approach the character of Christ as near as did Washington in self-forgetfulness, unselfishness and in devoting his life to the good of his fellowmen. Christ is unrivaled and unapproachable; but as men faultily reflect the beauty, the simplicity, the greatness and the love of his life they become great and endear themselves to the world. That which we find in the life of Lincoln to admire and love is wherein he reflects the character of Christ. And so it is in every As one is filled with Christ, is dominated by his spirit, is controlled by his ideals and motives, he becomes great and good.

Columbus, Ind., Jan. 30, 1900.

The Tongue as a Grave-Digger.

Volubility in public speech is to man what beauty is to woman. Both are fatal gifts unless tempered with discretion. Men dig their political graves with their tongues. Letter-writing was once the dangerous diversion for politicians. The Sage of Kinderhook advised a walk of forty miles rather than the writing of a single letter. Now that the newspaper is a daily phonograph, to catch and re-echo the whispered utterances of statesmen, public speaking is twin in pitfalls and perilousness to letterwriting. When detected in inconsistent or unpopular speech the politician has only the refuge of unblushing denial-a dodge which is seldom safe or successful. This is the year of public speaking. When Americans make presidents it is done while oratory is at white-heat. There will be a million political addresses in the United States in the next six months. They will vary in length and logic, in size and sense, but each will have auditors from the orator of national fame who fills the greatest metropolitan hall to the branch-water politician in the log schoolhouse at the cross-roads.

The Valley of Discontent.

FLORENCE E. M'CORKLE.

Away and away in the country that is called the Soul-land there is a dreary spot known as the Valley of Discontent. Once upon a time, having lost sight of my guide, I strayed into that distressful place, and have long kept in mind the purpose of setting down the things I there beheld, that perhaps I may warn others from its sortors.

The way is easy to find. The manybranched road called Selfishness will lead one straight to the place; it is the only road that enters there. The valley is wide enough to hold much people; and, indeed, I have heard it said that one-third of the people of the earth spend there a great portion of their lives. All about it rise towering mountains, their summits touching heaven's blue. The names of these are Usefulness, Happiness, Gratitude, Peace (or, as it is sometimes called, Heart-rest), Unselfishness, the highest peak of which is called Love, and many others of like grandeur and beauty.

The first thing I perceived concerning the valley itself was the thick, dark cloud that overhangs it, causing it to be in perpetual gloom. At first I thought I had entered the region of night, which is called Despair, but soon my eyes grew accustomed to the dusky light and I could observe on what sort of place I had stumbled. Instead of the rich and fertile valleys through which my guide had led me in this country, the one I had now found without his help I saw to be a wofully barren stretch of land. In truth, nothing grows there but thorn bushes, and many a sharp and jagged rock thrusts its ugly tooth through the earth. Upon these hurtful things the unfortunates in the valley are falling continually. Some are too proud to cry out, and bear the pain in silence; but others complain aloud, and with their lamentations make the valley doubly

A narrow stream of water bounds the valley, running at the base of the mountain range, and separating the inhabitants of the lowland from those of the mountains. No great effort would be needed to leap across this stream and gain the mountain side, yet few escape so. Partly because of the shadow of the cloud, and partly because their eyes are dimmed with a haze, the wanderers in this wretched place see nothing as it is. They stand and gaze with sore longing toward some serene and lofty height, never perceiving that it is near, but supposing it far removed, in distance unattain-And if one of them should dream of setting out on so long a journey, one glance at the water that flows before him kills all hope; for alas! to this miserable one, the harmless little brook seems a furious torrent, not able to be crossed, rushing between him and his heart's desire and whirling away in its swift current his only chance of escape. Now and then one will clear the haze out of his eyes and realize that he is able to guit this abode of bitterness. Then the Valley of Discontent knows him no more, for he bounds across the stream (now stripped of its terrors) and, if he be wise, spends his remaining days in glad, free life upon the hills of God. Many a tiny footpath scrambles down the mountain sides, leading to the broad highway of Selfishness, and the newly escaped must take good heed lest he be betrayed into following one of these and find himself again in the dark and dreadful valley.

Surely, one can find few more sorrowful valleys in all the Soul-land, and every wise traveler avoids the road that leads to the Valley of Discontent.

How To Proceed.

BY C. N. HOWARD.

"How shall we proceed to close the Sunday saloon? Never mind about the Sunday saloon; go in with tremendous energy to shut the saloon on Monday and Saturday and the liquor men would give you Sunday without a contest. How enforce the law that closes the saloon at midnight? Never mind about the midnight closing law; turn your guns on the law that opens the saloon at midday and every saloon in town will buy a clock. How enforce the law that makes it a crime to sell drink to a man that is drunk? Never mind the law that forbids vaccination to a man who died with the smallpox; train your Gatlings on the infamous law that makes it right to innoculate a man with the only disease that the lav makes it a crime to catch. How enforce the law that prevents the sale of drinks to criminals in the penitentiary? By making criminals of the men who sell them liquor before they get into the penitentiary and after they get out." Mr. Howard's remedy was "A lock on the saloon door that would exhaust the genius of perdition to pick."-Reform Review.

PETE. I.—The Mystery.

J. BRECKENRIDGE ELLIS.

The four girls stood as if petrified on earing the man's voice. He had come up shind them, and now he shuffled in front of ete who still held the big knife. There as a moment of unpleasant silence and then adge suddenly turned and ran as fast as e could across the lot toward the yard. nda May and Letitia would have followed they could, but they were too scared to ove. The man who had claimed the knife owed by the very way he breathed that he as a tramp. He made a noise somewhere in his nose whenever he took a breath, d he seemed to take more breaths than her people, and when he puffed out his air, hich he did through his mouth, with anher noise, you could tell what was down in s stomach. That was whisky. His feares were not bad, but they had been negeted. He had even let his shoulders sag wn, and his back hump over, till he had a ean and sneaking appearance. Whiskers ew rampant all over his face, and they nched up in spots as if they had found ocsional places of rich fertility; and if you amined his whiskers you could get a fair ea of what he had had for dinner. His es were large and black, but he didn't like look at you. He seemed to take a good al of comfort in his long, straight nose, and kept looking down the side of it as if he ere telling it something. "I say, little l," he said presently, "that there's my

They ew Mrs. Morris was away from home. ey saw Madge scurrying around the house, r apron flying in the breeze. The tramp poped and picked up his knife. They were ad to see him shut the blade and put the eapon in his pocket.

"And this here's my coat," he said, pickg it up. "Thanky for fetchin' it down. I It it in my bedroom. You're a good little I to save me the trouble of gittin' it mylf. I hates to do anything myself. I hates

"Who told you you could sleep in our ft?" demanded Pete with some severity. "Oh, Pete!" whispered Letitia. "Let's go the house."

"Nap told me," said the tramp.

"And who's Nap?" demanded Pete. "(You n go to the house if you want to.)"

"I am Nap," said the tramp. "When I ants to do anything I just asts myself. And I says I can, I does."

"Well, I can tell you this," said Pete, inting her finger at the man, "that no-body's afraid of you, and you can't sleep in our barn another night."

"Well, I'm glad you told me," said Nap, "'cause you see I didn't know, and I needed to find out. 'Cause I was thinkin' about making this my permanent boardin' house while I was in the city. Now, I'll tell you what I'll do. I'll agree never to come here no more if your mother says so. I just leave it to your mother. If she says for me to go away, I'll go away. I won't leave the city, but I'll keep away from your place. I don't impose my company on no man nor no woman, and when I finds I ain't wanted I takes my hat and I makes my bow and I departs."

"Well," said Pete, "this is a pretty good time to make your bow."

"I'll tell you what I'll do," said the strange tramp. "I reckon your mother got my letter?"

"Yes she did, and she didn't like it, either."

"I reckon not," said the tramp, winking at the side of his nose. It was strange how knowing and secret Nap's nose looked whenever Nap winked at it. "But they's some things you've got to get whether you like 'em or not. Measles is one; and that letter was another. Now, I'll tell you what I'll do. If I find the barn door latched tonight when I come for to make it my dormitory—is that too big a word for you, little gal?"

"No, it's not," said Pete sharply. "Its something in connection with circuses."

"Circuses?" repeated Nap. "Oh, camels, you will be thinking of? Ah! But when I come to-night, if the door is latched, I'll go away and come no more. But if it's propped open, I'll consider that an invitation to sleep here. But mark me, little gal," said the tramp, pointing his finger at Pete just as she had pointed hers at him, "you leave it to your mother. If you latch that door without telling her all about it, you will get her into a sight of trouble. And if she latches it, she'll get herself into a sight of trouble. And now I'll be againg, for I see your sister is bringing a man here to talk to me, and I don't like men; they're too much like myself"

"Well," said Pete, as Nap was climbing the back fence, "I'll thank you for the candy, anyhow."

"What candy?" called Nap as he dropped into the road.

"What you put in the box with the letter," called Pete. "But we don't want any more."

"You won't git no more from me," called Nap, with a queer chuckle. He slouched away just as Madge entered the lot with a young man. "There he goes," cried Madge, showing the young man.

"Yes," said Pete, "I got rid of him."

"Oh, Madge!" cried Linda May, "how could you run away from us."

"Madge is a coward," said Letitia with a toss of her head.

"Yes," said Madge, "you were too scared to run. I was just scared enough."

"Madge," cried Linda May indignantly, "You left us when he might have killed us all with that bloody knife!"

"Yes," said Madge, "that's why I ran off. But when I saw this—." She paused, for it didn't seem proper to call the visitor a "man," and she couldn't think of "gentleman" in her excitement. "When I saw this—this—."

"Don't you know what it is?" asked the young man. Then he laughed and all of them laughed. "My name is Brown; Edgar Brown."

"Well," said Madge, "I called him to help us, because Jennie wasn't anywhere to be found. So he came with me. My name's Madge. Well, I guess the show's over."

"I suppose that means that you don't want me any more," said the young man.

"Oh, don't be in a hurry," said Madge, without much warmth. They walked toward the yard. "You ought to see me shake my finger at Nap," said Pete, dancing along. "And I just told him to make his bow and go away. And I said to him: 'Nobody is afraid of YOU.'"

"Yes," said Letitia, "but you didn't say it that fierce."

"That's because my breath wasn't good," returned Pete. "And anyhow, you and Linda May stood there just a sweatin' in your shoes."

"Why, Pete!" cried Madge. "What kind of language is that you are using, and before Mr. Brown?"

"I don't care," said Pete. "Everyday language is no good when you're telling about such adventures as we've been through. What do you think, Mr. Brown? We put our box out in the yard—"

"Pete!" said Madge sharply. "You are not to tell that. Mamma won't like it."

"I ain't going to tell that part. The tramp said for us to see what we'd find in it next day. So this morning—this was next day—we looked and we found—"

"Now Pete!"

"I ain't going to tell that part. And we found a sack of candy."

"Now don't tell any more!" cried Madge. "I ain't."

"And I'm going to put out a box in my yard to-night," said Linda May, "and see what I'll find."

"So am I," said Letitia.

Bethany Reading Courses.

Bethany C. E. Reading Courses.

J. Z. TYLER.

The Bethany C. E. Reading Courses present three distinct lines of study, namely, the English Bible, the Plea and History of the Disciples, and Christian Missions.

One line is taken up at a time. The months of October, November and December will be devoted entirely to the study of the Bible; January, February and March to the study of the Disciples; April, May and June to the study of Missions.

There are three handbooks for each line of study. The handbooks for Bible study are entitled: "A Guide to Bible Study," "Life and Teachings of Jesus," and "Prophets of Israel." The handbooks for the study of the Disciples are entitled: "Concerning the Disciples," "Sketches of our Pioneers," and "Bible Doctrine for Young Disciples." The handbooks for the study of missions are entitled: "Handbook of Missions," "Missionary Fields and Forces of the Disciples," and "Heroes of Modern Missions." In each line, the first-named book gives a bird's-eye view of the entire field; the remaining two give special attention to important sections in that field.

A thirty-two page monthly, the King's Business, is the official organ of the Reading Circle. It is edited by John E. Pounds, National Supt. of C. E. for the Disciples, and Jessie Brown Pounds. It contains supplementary readings, direction sheets, questions for quarterly examinations, and all needed helps.

Quarterly examinations are had for the twofold purpose of securing definite results from the readings and of recording proper credit to the readers. These examinations are very simple. Certificates of graduation are granted those who complete the courses: (1) A course certificate to those who have finished a course, and (2) a complete certificate to those who have taken all three courses. These certificates are furnished without expense to those receiving them.

WHO SHOULD TAKE THESE COURSES?

While the original purpose of the Bethany C. E. Reading Courses was the instruction and indoctrination of the young people in the C. E. Societies among the Disciples of Christ, experience has shown that the purpose and plan are admirably adapted to others. Many auxiliary societies of the C. W. B. M., for instance, have found those courses exactly suited to their needs. and have increased the interest in their meetings by their use. Groups of persons not connected with any society have come together for the sole purpose of mutual help in taking these readings and many individuals, old as well as young, have found both pleasure and profit in pursuing these courses privately. It is being discovered that the field to be cultivated by these Reading Courses is not limited to Christsan Endeavor Societies, but that it includes all persons who need elementary instruction in its three chosen lines of study.

HOW TO ORGANIZE A CIRCLE.

The way to organize a Reading Circle is very simple. Any one can do it. Some course like the following may be pursued: (1) Have the matter thoroughly announced; (2) have a wide-awake committee make a canvass, enrolling all who think they might take these readings, whether privately or in the circle; (3) then call a conference meeting of all interested; (4) choose a leader and arrange for regular meetings; (5) make two lists, one including those who can attend the meetings with reasonable regularity, and the other including those who will take the readings privately; (6) order the King's Business and the necessary hand-books.

THE COST OF THESE COURSES.

This is not a money-making scheme. Supplies are furnished at barely enough to pay the cost of putting them into the hands of the readers. The handbooks are admirable specimens of bookmaking. They are about 4x7 inches and contain from 150 to 174 pages each. They were prepared especially for these courses by picked men, and are furnished to the readers, postpaid, at 35 cents per single copy, or any three books for one dollar. The regular subscription price of the King's Business is fifty cents a year, but to those taking these courses (any three books) it is sent for 25 cents a year. All orders should be sent to J. Z. Tyler, 798 Republic St., Cleveland, O.

NINE NOTEWORTHY POINTS.

- 1. There is great and widespread need of instruction along the lines covered by these
- 2. This is the only attempt made by the Disciples of Christ to furnish systematic instruction for all their people, old and young, along these lines.
- 3. The plan aims to utilize the spare moments in busy lives for the purpose of accumulating knowledge concerning these fundamental matters. These courses are for busy people.
- 4. These courses furnish every pastor an opportunity for systematic teaching; and there is confessedly great need of more thorough instruction in all our churches. We must teach as well as preach.
- 5. The cost of these courses places them within the reach of all. No membership fee is now required. The handbooks make a valuable addition to any library, and the King's Business is an excellent magazine for any home.
- 6. The study of these courses leads to definite results. There are quarterly examinations; there are certificates of graduation. They systematize one's daily readings.
- 7. They help every worthy cause. By awakening a desire for reading, they create a demand for the larger books issued by our publishing houses and enlarge the subscription lists of our papers. By disseminating missionary intelligence, they generate and guide missionary enthusiasm and activity. By stimulating a desire to learn, they tend to increase the attendance at our colleges. These courses are auxiliary to every good thing among us; they are the rival of none.
- 8. They enable every C. E. Society to become an educational center. It is generally recognized that there is danger of the C. E. movement effervescing, expending its enthusiasm without making much progress. The addition of the educational element is the remedy. What a tremendous power for lasting good would the C. E. Societies among us become if only they would seriously take hold of this educational movement!
- 9. They have stood the test of time. On July 1, 1900, they completed their first three-year cycle. More than 20,000 copies of their handbooks have gone into circulation. Multitudes of readers have sent in words of hearty appreciation. Leading brethren have given these courses a most unqualified endorsement. They have become an established institution among the Disciples of Christ.

More Bible Study Needed.

The Bible cannot be studied overmuch, and with the enormous output of all sorts of literature from all sorts of publishers, it is difficult to get young people or old people to give proper attention to the Book of books. Its study is, therefore, likely to be underdone rather than overdone. The Bethany C. E. Reading Courses commend themselves to every mind as a promising movement in the right direction. I am heartily in favor of them and will do what I can to make them a success.

Value of the Bethany C. E. Riding Circle Work.

JOHN E. POUNDS.

National Superintendent of C. E. for the ples of Christ.

Something more than organization is necessary to success. There must be preparation. It is no magic in Christian Endeavor members which will make one able to teach the truth the Scriptures to the world without he learned them. The worker of to-day must before he can show himself an approved work. The weakness of our young people is their of knowledge.

It matters little whether one would be a day-school teacher, a winner of souls by pen contact and invitation, a leader in the mission activities and organizations of the church preacher of the gospel or the humblest work the most obscure way, knowledge is the requisite of success. Even the love which instand sustains our activities succeeds only which produces a zeal that is according to knowledge.

How can one labor intelligently for the sucoff the kingdom of God if he does not know wits triumphs have been or how they were won is not capable of forming a wise and compresive plan of work who does not know what have been tried and found successful by twho have planted the gospel in every nation. Samaria to the uttermost parts of the earth. success of modern missions, together with lives of the most prominent missionaries, muknown by every largely successful worker be his equipment is complete. The knowledghow to do the work and the inspiration for it both necessary, and they come from a stud missions.

Again, every young Disciple of Christ sh know the history of his own people. He ca of little value to the work unless he does. how can he tell the people the difference churches if he does not know any? The only tives he can present to people to unite with church where his own membership is, are a surface ones. They will be such as: "We ha beautiful building"-which is doubtful-or, have an eloquent preacher"-which is a matte opinion-or, "Our church is very friendly"-w after all appeals to selfishness. There is not word about a "Thus saith the Lord" or the sh doctrine of the New Testament. Our young ple must know the history and teaching of Disciples of Christ if they are to be worthy of most worthy fathers.

Above all, the knowledge of God's Word i sential to all Christian life and work. We know before we can either be or bless. Kr edge of God's truth is spiritual life and po The difference between success and failur soul-winning is very often a difference of kr edge. We must educate or others must pe The success of the apostles in preaching Word was at least partly due to their pers training by Jesus. For he taught them, ds day, for three years; and even in the highly cated and strangely converted Saul of Te went into the Arabia of a three-year study meditation before going abroad to preach o sus the Christ. If these specially gifted wor needed such training, every servant does.

Our young people do not appreciate what been done for them. The handbooks on "sions," on "the Disciples" and on "Bible St are the best productions of masters. No one study them without great profit. It will make Endeavor Society anew to study them system ally. If I could have just one thing for all ou citeties it would certainly be a Reading Circle each one. The society that neglects this magreat opportunity. By all means organize Bethany C. E. Reading Courses and Bible Study.

Much has been done by this most admirable system to awaken among young people a deeper interest in the Holy Scriptures. What the Bible is, how to study it and how to use it are questions of vital importance, and the trouble of the eunuch is that of thousands: "How can I understand except some one should guide me?" The handbooks of the Reading Course, and supplementary readings from the ablest writers among us are intended to supply this want.

For the months of October, November and December our readers will devote themselves exclusively to the Word of God. The Departments of Missions and Study of the Disciples will be taken up later and given an equal division of the time. Now is the time to begin the organization of circles.

"Bring the Book, said Sir Walter Scott, when dying. "What book?" asked his friend. "There s only one Book-the Bible," replied the dying man. If this be the conviction of one who so thoroughly knew books, and who himself wrote books that will never die, surely such a volume is worth devout and earnest and systematic study on the part of lesser minds. To quote the same "Within that awful volume lies The mystery of mysteries! Happiest they of human race, To whom our God has granted grace To read, to fear, to hope, to pray, To lift the latch and force the way; And better had they been ne'er born Who read to doubt, or read to scorn."

A Greater Foundation.

I am glad that the directors of the Bethany C E. Reading Courses have provided for three months' systematic Bible study, beginning in October. Our young people will not only gain a greater knowledge of the Bible while pursuing this course, learning to appreciate more fully its beauty and significance, withal applying its holy principles in the development of their own lives, but they will thus receive preparation and inspiration for a more profitable study of the Scriptures in years to come. He who appreciates the value of knowing and loving the Word of God cannot but commend, and that most heartily, this feature of the course.

I should be glad to see a large number of our people, including those not belonging to the C. E. Society, take the B. C. E. Reading Courses. To do so means a greater foundation for intellectual and moral culture, thus assuring additional joy, larger views as to life's mission and more effective services under the leadership of Christ.

The Pastor's Opportunity.

The day is to come when the knowledge of the Lord shall cover the earth as the waters cover the sea. This knowledge is possible only through his Word. Let us hail the dawning of this day. Never were the helps to Bible study as helpful as now. Never was the interest so intense. Never was attention so enticed. Never were opportunities so multiplied. Praise the Lord!

October, November, December are to be devoted to Bible study by thousands of our people under the direction of the Bethany Reading Circle. The pastor who does not seize this opportunity, or find some better way to teach the Word, is unworthy. Send now to Bro. J. Z. Tyler at Cleveland, O., for particulars. MARION STEVENSOM.

God's Order of Nobility.

The Beareans were more noble because they received the Word with all readiness and searched the Scriptures daily. One of the needed revivals of to-day is the revival of Bible study. There is need to swell the ranks of God's order of nobility as a safeguard against the foolish fads and pesky delusions that spring from the hotbeds of skepticism and superstition. We have Jehus who ride hobbies rather than horses, for they are less expensive. Men and women of intelligent faith are as iron in the blood and tonic in the bones of a church or a community. When people "delight in to law of the Lord, and meditate therein." we shall have more trees well rooted and bringing forth fruit, and less chaff driven hither and thither by every wind of doctrine.

The faithful study of the Bethany C. E. Reading Courses will give us a generation of "sons as plants grown up in their youth, and daughters as cornerstones polished after the similitude of a palace." H. D. CLARK.

Mere Enthusiasm not Enough.

The promoters of the Bethany C. E. Reading Courses are placing our great brotherhood under lasting obligations in their efforts to create a deeper interest among our young people in systematic Bible study. Mere enthusiasm in Endeavor work becomes but an efferverscence at last unless it rests on a knowledge of the Word. Of all religious bodies we as a people can least afford to be ignorant of our own text-book. "Study to show yourself approved unto God," was a divine injunction never to be antedated.

Should Organize at Once.

We of all people should be first first in careful, systematic Bible study. A leader and a program are most helpful. The Bethany C. E. Reading Course provides both. Every Christian Endeavor Society should organize a class at once for the three months' special study in the Bible. It will sharpen their appetites for a larger study of the precious book. Preachers and church officers can do much to create an interest in this special study. Our people will grow in usefulness as they come F. M. RAINS. to know more of the Bible.

Fit the Grocer

WIFE MADE THE SUGGESTION.

A grocer has excellent opportunity to know the effects of special foods on his customers. Mr. R. A. Lytle, of 557 St. Clair St., Cleveland, O., has a long list of customers that have been helped in health by leaving off coffee and using Postum Food

He says, regarding his own experience: "Two years ago I had been drinking coffee and must say that I was almost wrecked in my nerves.

"Particularly in the morning I was so irritable and upset that I could hardly wait until the coffee was served, and then I had no appetite for breakfast and did not feel like attending to my store duties.

"One day my wife suggested that inasmuch as I was selling so much Postum Food Coffee there must be some merit in it, and suggested that we try it. I took home a package and she prepared it according to directions. The result was a happy one. My nervousness gradually disappeared and to-day my nerves are all right. I would advise every one affected in any way with nervousness or stomach troubles, to leave off coffee and use Postum Food Coffee."

OUR FOOLISH EXCUSES.

"A previous engagement" is always a matter that cannot be adjusted. If one is asked to a p lace to which he really desires strongly to go, he can always find a way to go-or make it. previous engagement," is a mere excuse, whether it be in the marrying of a wife, the trying of a yoke of oxen or the viewing of a piece of land. If one wishes to accept an invitation, he can do it.

If Queen Victoria invites some one to her presence, all other affairs give way. So high an honor must not be neglected. And most of our people, if they are asked to a box party, house party, or a yachting excursion, will waive all other affairs and accept. Such invitations do not come daily. But, if one does not wish to go, it is so easy to persuade oneself, if not the host, that one has a pressing engagement.

And so it was with these in the parable. An opportunity confronted them which they, for one reason or another, did not care to embrace, and so the business of each was of pressing importance. Those oxen-why, they could not live till the morrow; that wife-why, she would have been so out of place as at a feast, fancy a bride at a banquet; and that land-well, it was likely to slide into the sea in an avalanche if it were not immediately looked after!

Thus do we cajole ourselves, but never blind anybody else. We are called to the performance of a duty. Some one in trouble is to be helped; in danger, to be rescued; in loneliness, to be cheered; and then we discover that our time is very limited, our business so important. How about the ball game? If we are offered a free seat with a friend, can't we bend business to suit? Well, yes, just for this one afternoon, by working a little harder next morning. But if asked to sing at a funeral or act as pall-bearer; if the opp ortunity comes to investigate the distresses of a family in need; if a political tangle needs investigation-then our business is pressing.

And as for the church, it is wonderful how people used, in old catholic days, to shape all their affairs so that they could go to church. while there is so much difficulty to-day. To be be sure, the church is somewhat to blame, its preaching is not what it should be, and its service is not so full of human interest as it might be; but after all there is much of pure and simple excuse that stands between us and the church

We Endeavorers have a clause in our pledge about "hindered by some reason which I can conscientiously give to my Lord and Master." There is no room in that for specious excuses. Yet, how often we make excuses do duty for reasons. There is a lull in the meeting, and we have not yet taken part. We persuade ourselves that we are not quite feeling well to-night. We are very tired. We have no thought or verse quite apropos. We are proving our yoke of oxen!

And as for the midweek services we have promised in our pledge to attend! How many of us haven't the excuse that we have married a wife, but that we are thinking of marrying a wife and must needs o and see her; or are thinking of investing in a go and see her; or are thinking of the fifty-foot lot on the installment plan and must needs go and view it, or are hoping when we get rich to buy a horse and buggy and must needs learn to drive so as to be prepared! An endless variety of—reasons? No, only excuses.

THIRD QUARTERLY REVIEW.*

About seven months of our Lord's earthly ministry are included in the lessons of the past quarter. Following the feeding of the five thousand, which occurred near the Passover season, in the spring of 29, A. D., we have traced the story of his life unto the late fall, going with him into the outlying districts of Phœnicia, northern Galilee, Decapolis and Perea, and visiting Jerusalem at the Feast of Tabernacles in the month of October. During these months we can plainly see the clouds of growing opposition gathering over the head of the Savior, which are soon to break in an awful storm of persecution and death. Calmly does the Son of Man set his face toward Jerusalem, with infinite sadness for the sin of his people in rejecting their Messiah, but with the serene majesty of a King who knows well that the future is his, and that the world that now frowns upon him will yet fall at his feet in reverence and love. We can find space for but a few lines of review of each of the interesting lessons of the quarter.

- 1. Jesus Walking on the Sea (Matt. 14:22-33). The miracle of feeding the multitude had wrought in the minds of many the conviction that Jesus was the Messiah, and they sought to proclaim him then and there as king. Refusing their homage, he disappeared from their midst, going up into a mountain for prayer and meditation. His disciples started in a boat for the western shore. A sudden storm burst upon the lake, and they were in utmost peril when the form of Jesus appeared to them, walking on the water. Terrified at what they thought an apparition, or a ghost, they cried out, but were reassured by the voice they knew so well, that voice which calms our fears and speaks peace to our troubled souls in every hour of dire distress. Peter, boldly starting to meet Jesus on the water, finds his courage failing him with the sudden impulse that moved bim to the act and would have sunken beneath the waves, but for the hand of Jesus outstretched to support him. How often our feet would sink in the waves of trial and temptation, did not that Hand rest beneath us still! The lesson of this story is Jesus' mastery over nature, and his loving care for those who put their trust n him.
- 2. Jesus the Bread of Life (John 6:22-40). The following morning the multitude returned around the northern end of the lake, and came to Capernaum searching for Jesus, led rather by curiosity and carnal desire than by the love of truth. Jesus deemed it time to draw the line of demarkation between his followers and his enemies, and so delivered that discourse which resulted in turning from him many who had called themselves his disciples. He teaches them that he is himself the true manna from heaven, sent for the spiritual nourishment of men. His life is imparted through faith and obedience, represented by a familiar figure as a feeding upon his body. Myriads have found his words true, and proven that Christ is to us the bread of life to feed, the water of life to cleanse, the way of life to travel, the crown of life to reward.
- 3. The Gentile Woman's Faith (Mark 7:24-30). Seeing the crowds turning from him, after his discourse on the Bread of Life, and already wearied of his arduous labors, Jesus went away into the province of Phœnicia, near the cities of Tyre and Sidon, into the midst of a heathen population, hoping here to find seclusion and rest. In this he was disappointed. "He could not be hid." Truth and love will ever make their presence and power known and felt. One incident only tells us the story of his unselfish ministry. A Gentile woman came to him, pleading for her daughter, who was possessed with an evil spirit. His first answer seemed harsh and cruel, but it was only to draw out the expression of her wonderful faith, and her prayer was then granted, with such words of ardent praise as must have been forever cherished in her heart.

- 4. Peter's Confession and Christ's Rebuke (Matt. 16:13-26). The confession that sprang from the lips of Peter in answer to the question of his Lord, "Who say ye that I am?" has become the foundation of the spiritual temple of God, the church of Jesus Christ. Theol gical systems shall have their day and cease to be, creeds shall be changed and abandoned, ceremonies and customs shall be modified in a thousand ways, but this rock will abide, and whosoever believeth in him shall have everlasting life. And to every one who, like Peter, would thrust aside the cross, and seek glory rather than sacrifice, the rebuke of the Master still comes with searching and withering effect.
- 5. The Transfiguration (Luke 9:28-36). Like the last lesson, the events of this occurred near Cæsarea Philippi, and probably upon a spur of Mount Hermon. The faith of the disciples must be strengthened, and Jesus himself, perhaps, be given renewed assurance of the Father's loving presence and favor. In the presence of three of the disciples Moses and Elijah appear in glory with Jesus and converse with him concerning his approaching death in Jerusalem. Its lessons are many, but chiefly does it assure us of the fact that the righteous dead are yet alive; that the souls of those who have departed in faith are glorified, and that Jesus Christ is Lord of all, having supplanted the law and the prophets. "This is my beloved Son; hear ye him!"
- 6. Jesus and the Children (Matt. 18:1-14). On the return from Cæsarea Philippi to Capernaum the disciples had disputed as to who should hold the chief offices in the coming kingdom. Jesus rebukes their carnal ambition by this beautiful discourse. The child is made the type of the disciple and his humility, trustfulness, simplicity, teachableness and affection are held up for our emulation.
- 7. The Forgiving Spirit (Matt. 18:21-35). In this lesson the Master teaches us that our mercy is not to be narrowed to any certain number of times, but to be exercised at every opportunity. True charity does not count occasions; it courts them. By the parable of the unmerciful servant he teaches us how wicked is our intolerance for others in the light of God's boundless mercy toward us.
- 8. The Man Born Blind (John 9:1-17). Jesus was in Jerusalem in attendance upon the Feast of Tabernacles, which was held in the seventh month of the Jewish year, about October. On a Sabbath day, as he went out from the temple, he passed a blind man lying by the wayside whose affliction dated from his birth. In answer to the question of the disciples he denied that the affliction was due to sin on the part of the unfortunate man or his parents, and accepted it as an occasion for doing the merciful works of his Heavenly Father. Anointing with clay the eyes of the blind man, he told him to go wash in the pool of Siloam, with the result that he came seeing. The grateful man's confession of faith in Jesus led to his being excluded from the synagogue, but resulted in bringing to him the knowledge of Jesus as the Son of God and joining him to his Savior in loving allegiance.
- 9. Jesus the Good Shepherd (John 10:1-17). The jealous hatred of the Pharisees and scribes. intensified by the fame of Jesus' miracles, drew from him the parable of our present lesson. They were the false shepherds who sought the sheep only that they might destroy. Every true teacher of the chosen people would gladly hail the advent of the Messiah whom they were so basely rejecting. He was the good Shepherd who so loved the sheep as to lay down his life for them He knew every one of them by name, and he went before them, leading them into green pastures and beside still waters. The time was coming when there would be one flock, under one shepherd, for in him all races of men would find the fulfillment of their hopes.

- 10 The Seventy Sent Forth (Luke 10:1-11; 17-20). The sending forth of these disciples was perhaps at the beginning of Jesus' tour through Perea, the country east of the Jordan. He could spend but a short time among these people, and these missionaries could help to spread the news of the coming kingdom. He sent them two and two, that they might mutually encourage each other in the difficult task. They were to go preaching and praying, trusting the people for their temporal support, bearing themselves meekly as lambs amid wolves, stopping not for formal greetings, but hastening as men who bore the King's message. They returned with joy, reporting what great things they had done in his name. and he rejoiced with them, and gave his approval upon their work.
- 11. The Good Samaritan (Luke 10:25-37). This gem among the parables was spoken in answer to the cavils of a scribe who sought to appear very religious, but whose religion was a cloak for his selfishness. Jesus teaches that the law of love will make us serve our fellowman in need, whoever he may be. No brief synopsis can convey the beauty and power of this wonderful word-picture. It must be studied in its every word.
- 12. The Rich Fool (Luke 12:13-23). The heart of this lesson is found in the declaration of Jesus that a man's life consisteth not in the abundance of the things that he possesseth. Life is conduct and character, not goods and gold. He who is rich toward God is the true millionaire, while he who lacks this true wealth is a pauper, though he may roll in worldly treasures. Death, the certain visitor at every door, will delare the eternal folly of him who sets his hopes on rices.

13. The Duty of Watchfulness (Luke 12:35-46.) By a number of brief parables the duty of being ever ready for the coming of the Lord is emphasized. To the unfaithful servant his coming is in judgment. To the faithful he will come with a joyous and rich reward. "Be ye ready. for at such an hour as ye think not the Son of Man cometh." Lord, may all the lessons we have learned of thee this quarter prepare us more fully for that great day!

Martha (Spirlock) Cameron was born Sept. 26, 1826. She gave herself to Christ when only 15 years of age and continued in his service to the close of her life She passed away Sept. 5, 1900, at her home in Sioux City, Ia., with all her family around her. Deceased was married to Wm Cameron are with a till surgives at the age. eron 55 years ago, who still survives at the age of 77. Her husband was a faithful proclaimer of the gospel for half a century and churches he established in Illinois and Minnesota still flourish as monuments to his faithful labors. In all their even:ful lives together nothing has ever occurred to mar the tranquility of their companionship, but to mar the tranquility of their companionship, but they were devoted to each other with childlike interest. Six children were born to them; three are gone to Jesus. The others, H. M. Cameron, single, residing with the parents, I. W. Cameron, a minister of the gospel at Weld on, Ia, and Mrs. Julia Stuart, of near Bloomfield, Neb., survive the deceased as well as the aged husband. Those who witnessed the end testified that it was the most sublime demonstration of patience, hope and faith that they ever witnessed. Anxious to depart and be with Carist, the wife and mother had only to regret the sorrow of those remaining, and with the glory of victory through a faithful life in Christ lighting up her countenance she gave all a speechless benediction by her smiles and loving looks as she gazed upon them for the last time in this life, and went home. Her life was an open book, a tale that is told and her works follow. The funeral was conducted by C. M. Wickham. Weldon, Ia. I. W. CAMERON.

LANDESS.

We have just laid to rest the remains of Bro John A. Landess, whose life spanned almost 87 years. He was born in Highland County, Ohio, and has been a valued citizen of Pike County, Illinois since 1865. He has worn the name and the yoke of Christ for 50 years. To his 10 children he leaves the priceless legacy of a good name and to his neighbors the inspiration of a long life well lived.

NELSON.

James T. Nelson was born in Kentucky, and died near his home in Hannibal, Mo, Aug. 10, 1900, aged 49 years and 10 months. Though in 1900, aged 49 years and 10 months. Though in delicate health for some time his sudden depart-ure was a great surprise to all. The church, the Sunday-school and the business circles of the city have sustained a great loss. He was cashier of the Bank of Hannibal for many years, and the bet-ter he was known the more his word was relied upon. As a deacon in the church his wise counsel modestly expressed was always received with great weight because in addition to his business judgment he breathed so much the spirit of the Master. As superintendent of the Sunday-school his kind disposition made him appearance. his kind disposition made him unusually successful. He had a smile and a pleasant word for every one. The children loved to sirg when led by one whose countenance expressed the joy of Christian living. As a leader of the church music he showed such a spirit of peace and harmony that no friction could emanate from a choir of which he was director. As a result of his life in the church those who remain a result of his life in the church those who remain will be able to show more of the spirit of the Savior as a result of his interpretation of the Christ-life among us. His every-day life indicated the indwelling of a pure soul. The family did everything to have him restored to health, and now that he has departed he has left a noble example of living to them and to the church. The wife and the children have the sympathy of the whole community in their bereavement.

FACTS ABOUT CHINA.

We recently published a booklet, entitled "Facts About China," by Wm. Remfrey Hunt, of Chu Cheo, China. Mr. Hunt has been for many years a resident of Central China, and is thoroughly acquainted with the country and its people. The following are some of his topics:

History and Age of China, The People of China, Populousness of China, Climate and Products,

Vastness of Chinese Empire, Classic and Sacred Systems, Strange Manners and Customs, Some Absurdities of Heathenism, Lauguage, Education and Literature, Missions in China.

"Facts About China" is concisely and tersely written. The purpose of the author is to convey information and to instruct and not to entertain or amuse. Nevertheless, the book is thoroughly interesting. A map of the Chinese Empire is included in the book.

The Work at Nevada, Mo.

I have just closed my pastorate at Nevada, Mo., and believing that it is due the congregation I wish to make a brief report. During the year I preached 156 times. We received into the congregation 56 persons, lost 11 by death and 39 by letter; had 14 funerals outside of the membership, making 25 for the year. Raised for current expenses, $2,275; on building fund, $1,425; Bibleschool, $247. Total for the year, $3,947. We closed the year entirely free from debt, except the debt on the church building, which amounts to $13,400. I did not resign, but simply declined to continue another year. I wish to say for the Nevada congregation that there is a large number of the best people in this world to be found among that congregation, and I think they will come out of all the reverses of past years and ultimately be one of the great churches of the brotherhood in Missouri. They have a membership of about 700, but not all consecrated. They have called Bro. G. D. Edwards, of north Missouri, late graduate of Harvard, and he will find a host of the right kind of people; but not all of them so, which is true of every church within the range of my acquaintance. I have been asked if they can pay the debt-to which I wish to answer: YES, they can; and I sincerely trust they may realize their ability and their responsibility, and think they will.

Bro. D. D. Boyle, who was the pastor of this church for three years, and who is an evangelist now of great power, is located there and will continue to hold meetings in Missouri and other parts of the nation; he will be a blessing to the church wherever he may hold meetings.

Nevada is also the home of Bro. S. McGee, who is preaching for churches in Vernon County to the entire satisfaction of his congregations, and under his ministry they are certainly flourishing. He has an excellent wife and an interesting family. I expect to enter upon the duties and work of an evangelist, and after Nov. 1st I expect to have associated with me in the work one of our best singing evangelists; but have not engaged him at this writing.

Book Notes.

W. H. Book, the successful Virginia evangelist, writing in the Christian Century, says of "Christian Science Dissected:"

This little booklet tells of the origin and history of this fad (Christian Science) and in an interesting way shows its fallacy. Every preacher should read it and be prepared to expose the doc-trine of Mrs. Eddy, which she learned from Dr. Quimby's writings.

We are preparing a second edition of "Christian Science Dissected." The first edition is practically exhausted. The book is having a rapid sale, and is destined to reach a large circulation.

Do not overlook the advertisement of the "Biographical and Historical Library," on the second page of this issue. It is truly a marvelous offer, which should be taken advantage of by hundreds of preachers and intelligent Disciples. Remember that the offer will be withdrawn on November 1. if our stock lasts that long, which is doubtful.

We are receiving a great many complimentary words concerning "Leaves from Mission Fields," by N. M. Ragland. We know that there are three parties to be congratulated on account of this work-the author, for having written it, the publisher for having been permitted to issue so excellent a volume and the public, for the privilege of reading such a work. "Leaves from Mission Fields" is a valuable contribution to our missionary literature. Price, $1, postpaid.

The Old Faith Restated, edited by J. H. Garrison, is a volume that should be found in the library of every preacher. One young preacher said to us: "If I could not buy another copy I would not take $1,000 for my 'Old Faith Restated. It helps me more than any other book I have." It is edited by J. H. Garrison, but is the joint work of seventeen of our leading men and best thinkers. Price, $2.

Another indispensable book for the preacher is "The Christian Worker," by J. H. Foy. It contains "everything." From it the preacher can obtain help in any phase of his work. It gives hints and suggestions for the conducting of funerals, performing of marriage ceremonies, outlines for sermons for all kinds of special occasions, notes of the respective duties of the several officers of the church, etc., etc., etc. It is a neat book, bound in cloth, and costs but seventy-five cents.

J. Breckenridge Ellis thus writes of "A Circuit of the Globe," by A. McLean:

As a book of travels this work ranks with the best. It is a narrative of thrilling interest, but it best. It is a narrative of thrilling interest, out is more—a valuable compendium of information on many foreign countries and a rich addition to the missionary literature of the Christian Church.

Alongside the Bible there are a few books that are indispensable to the Christian preacher. This is one of them. The mechanical execution of the work pays a high compliment to the publishers, and its wealth of half-tones familiarize the reader with many missionaries and mission stations.

Go to the Kansas City Convention, Oct, 11-18 in Comfort, Elegance and Good Company via the Christian-Evangelist Special.

We are a great people, Kansas City is a great city and we are sure to have a great convention. If it is at all possible you ought to go. It will be the very best opportunity to see and hear the leaders of our cause from all parts of our land. Old acquaintances may be renewed, new ones formed, and much can be learned concerning the state of the cause at home and abroad at this greatest gathering of the Disciples. The CHRIS-TIAN-EVANGELIST wants its readers, as far as possible, to attend and has provided special chair cars for their transportation.

The CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST Special Excursion will leave St. Louis via the Burlington Route at 9 A. M., Thursday, October 11, in splendid chair cars provided for the exclusive use of the party, which will consist, not alone of the membership of St. Louis and vicinity, but also of those coming from other points via St. Louis, who desire to accept our invitation to join us.

The Burlington Railroad traverses a section of country in which our brethren are very numerous and we fully expect that the kindness of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST in thinking about their comfort and convenience will be appreciated and that we will take into Kansas City several coachloads of people to attend the convention.

If you live along the line of the Burlington Route or can conveniently join us at any point, you are invited to full and unlimited membership in our excursion party. Speak to your pastor and other interested members about the desirability of having a large delegation from your church. Do not make the mistake of delaying your attendance on the theory that the first part of the convention is not as interesting as the latter portion, for the opening sessions and the communion service which follows them on Sunday are considered by very many to be the best of the convention. To be early on the ground is to avoid any possible rush or confusion in your assignment to your hotel or or boarding house. There is one request we would like to make, and that is that you let us know as early as possible if you are going with us. We make this request in order that we may know just how many coaches to secure, for we expect every one who joins the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST Special Excursion to be provided with a comfortable chair. Do not neglect to write us, therefore. The cost of transportation from St. Louis to Kansas City and return will be $9.50 plus 50 cents for joint agency fee at Kansas City, making a total of $10 for the trip. The rate from all points for the round trip is one fare plus $2.00 and the joint agency fee of 50 cents, except from points within two hundred miles or less of Kansas City; in such instances the rate is one fare and a third, with no joint agency fee.

Remember that all the passengers in our coaches will be of those attending the convention; that the cars themselves will be of the Burlington's best equipment, and that the road over whi pass is one of the very best in the state of Missouri. Further information on request.

Address communications to W. D. Cree, in care of this office, and please do it at once.

Of Interest to Delegates from Central Illinois to Kansas City Convention.

The delegates from Springfield, Ill., believing from last year's pleasant experience at Cincinnati, that the pleasure of the convention is greatly enhanced by arranging to be entertained in companies, have decided so upon the Washington Hotel as their place of entertainment and respectfully suggest making it headquarters for Central Illinois. The hotel is one of the best in the city and is conveniently situated, being on the car line leading direct to the convention hall. The moderate sate of $2 per day has been secured. If you desire accommodations with the Illinios people at the Washington write at once direct to the hotel and so advise

CURRENT EVENTS.

The strike of the coal miners has now been in progress a little more than a week and so far the course of events has been rather favorable to the strikers. Beginning with about 112,000, at the end of the first week probably not less than 130,000 men had quit work. This increase is naturally encouraging to the strikers, but it has not been accomplished without some of those disorderly scenes which form the regrettable element of all such industrial crises. Bands of striking miners have interfered with the non-union men who wish to continue at work; and even those newspaper correspondents whose accounts are most vividly colored by sympathy for the miners, relate how the strikers' wives "heroically" assailed with brickbats the men who were going to the mines. The first decided clash between the strikers and the sheriff's posse resulted in twelve casualties, two of which were fatal. The placing of the blame for such an affair is a difficult matter. crowd of strikers, naturally rough men and desperate with their grievances, and an armed posse, perhaps a little too excitable and too anxious to hear the crack of their own guns. Whichever side starts the trouble, starts it only because there is an imminent probability that the other will start it a moment later. It is not to be expected that there can be a coal miner's strike, involving the idleness of so many men, without some such disorders. A secand statement issued by Mr. Mitchell, Presilent of the Union, gives a fuller statament of the contention of the strikers, and shows why they have refused the arbitration that has been offered by certain independent operators (such as Markle Bros. The real opponents of the striking miners, says Mr. Mitchell, are the nine railroad companies, which he names, which control mines producing about 72 per cent. of the hard coal and which are the sole carriers to the tidewater of all the Pennsylvania anthracite. By putting up the freight rates, it is made to appear that the mines are unprofitable and that]there can, therefore, be no increase in the pay of the miners. The smaller operators are also sufferers from these exorbitant freight rates, which are three times as high for hard as for soft coal. Arbitration with these smaller operators would not touch the main trouble, says Mr. Mitchell. The case must be settled between these railroad companies and the miners. while the slender resources of the latter are being rapidly exhausted, while the rise in the price of coal will save the latter from any serious loss, unless the strike is long continued.

The Philippine Commission under the leadership of Mr. Taft, which is now investigating conditions in the archipelago with a view to the establishment of civil government, has sent a report in response to a request from the President. Business conditions are said to be improving and revenues are much increased. The rebellion still exists only in isolated corners and in diminished force. It is the judgment of the Commission that "the insurrection will disappear within sixty days if the present policy is continued." There is, however, sufficient disorder to call for careful and systematic police service, and this need can best be met by the organization of native militia and constabulary. The political bearing of the report has subjected it to much criticism. The opinion of the commissioners is that the Democratic platform has given great encouragement to the insurgents and has delayed their surrender. Whether or not this is true, it seems to be questionable taste for a Commission which is expected to keep itself clear of the entanglements of politics, to express itself so openly and pointedly in an official report. The report says: "Our policy of leniency, culminating in amnesty, had a marked effect to induce surrenders until the defining of political issues in the United States, reported here in full, gave hope to insurgent officers still in arms of a changed policy and stayed the surrenders to await the result of elections." Democratic journals have not been slow to suggest that this report was called forth as a campaign document. The Springfield Republican (independent and anti expansionist) calls it "a prostitution of high public office to personal ends" and queries, "Are we to be governed from Manila?" The fear of being governed from Manila because a report from there may help to determine the policy which we are to pursue toward the Philippines, seems to us to be rather an artificial alarm. But the question of taste, above referred to, is still open. The statement of facts in the report will, of course, have just such weight as the known integrity of the Commission and its opportunities for acquiring accurate information entitle it to; and any denials of these alleged facts must be put to the same test.

The work of restoration in Galveston goes on with most commendable vigor. If there was ever any doubt as to whether the city would be rebuilt on its old site, that doubt has vanished. There will be a new Galveston and a better one. Martial law in the city has now been suspended, and the task of maintaining order is in the hands of the civil authorities, but the militia still remain to re-enforce the police. There are no idle men in the city. All able-bodied men are impressed into the street-cleaning force, and hereafter money and supplies will be issued only to those who work. The task of clearing away the debris of the flood is tremendous. No contractor has been found who is willing to make a bid upon it, but it has been estimated that it would take 2,000 men 90 days to complete the work. The reports which have come in from the small towns on the mainland adjacent to Galveston give a death list of 254. Poor Texas is getting more than her share of floods. Recent rains have swollen the rivers of that state until they are in a dangerous and destructive condition. The Colorado, Brazos, Llano and Trinity Rivers are sweeping away bridges and houses and destroying much property. No lives have yet been lost, but it is feared there will be much more destruction before the water subsides.

The British parliamentary elections, which are now pending, have failed to produce even a fraction of the usual campaign excitement and enthusiasm. The apathy is perhaps due to the certainty, conceded even by the opposition, that the government will be sustained. Unlike our own Congress, the British Parliament has no fixed duration. It is limited to seven years, but can be dissolved sooner and a new election held if the leader of the government considers the time ripe for an appeal to the people. The conclusion of the war in South Africa makes the present administration more certain of endorsement just now, in the judgment of Lord Salisbury, than it would be two years hence, when the term of this Parliament would expire by limitation. Hence the House of Commons is to be dissolved on September 25 and new elections are to be held beginning October 1. The elections will be finished in the course of two weeks and the new Parliament will meet early in November. The speed of this arrangement is in striking contrast with the thirteen months interval between our November congressional election and the assembling of the new Congress in December of the following year. The Liberals have so little chance of success in this election, that the government is not even taking pains to explain its policy very fully. The strongest and most comprehensive campaign document up to date is an address issued by Lord Salisbury.

During the past week some important diplomatic correspondence relating to the Chinese situation has been made public, namely, the text of the German demand upon China, a message from Prince Ching, and three inquiries from the Russian government, with the replies of our government to the same. Germany reiterates her statement that "the Emperor considers as a preliminary condition for entering into diplomatic negotiations with the Chinese government, a surrender of such persons as are determined upon, being the first and real perpetrators of the crimes committed in Pekin against international law." No method of trial is suggested further than that the ministers in Pekin shall "designate" those whose gilt is unquestionable. It was already certain that China would reject this proposition. The note of Acting Secretary Hill in reply to the German inquiry as to the position which our government will take, is a brief but statesmanlike document, setting forth our intention to hold China to a strict account for the recent outrages, but pointing out the fact that these outrages were not confined to Pekin, and that the demand for satisfaction for them should be part of the diplomatic negotiations rather than a prelimin ary to them. It is stated that it is the purpose of our government to name plenipotentiaries to negotiate with China, and in the meantime to empower our minister at Pekin to enter into conference for the formulation of a preliminary agreement. A note from Prince Ching inquires whether the United States government will recognize the plenipotentiary powers of himself and Li Hung Chang in the peace negotations. The reply is affirmative and adds that Minister Conger will be authorized to enter into relations with them at once.

The Russian government forwards three questions: (1) Does our government moving its intend legation Pekin to Tien-Tsin? (2) Are the powers of Prince Ching and Li Hung Chang recognized? (3) Are we prepared through our representatives in Pekin to enter at once apon preliminary negotiations? The answers are: (1) No. (2) Yes. (3) Yes. will be observed that the contents of these notes mark out pretty clearly the general plan of operations and insure a speedy beginning of negotations. Germany's demand for the surrender of the guilty parties has not been backed up by the other Powers, and has been refused by China. Indeed, if, as is strongly suspected, Prince Tuan and the Empress are really the guilty parties, it is hard to see how the government could be expected to give them up for punishment. They are the government, rather more than anybody else, and Prince Tuan has been promoted within the past week to the position of Grand Secretary to the Emperor. England and Japan agree to Germany's proposal. Russia and France are somewhat noncommittal, but incline to the American view. If our attitude meant that we intended to shirk our share of responsibility in connection with China's imminent day of reckoning there would be ground for the copious criticism in which the German press has indulged. But, as the London Times says, it is our known habit not to withdraw weakly from such situations. Even though our troops are to be withdrawn from China, leaving only a legation guard of about 1,400 in Pekin, the sending of a fleet of warships to Chinese waters shows that we intend to protect our interests and do our share of the unpleasant work of regulating China.

But while peace negotiations in Pekin are in a fair way to get started, in spite of the international disagreement in regard to the preliminaries, there still remains the question of protection for American residents and interests in China in the immediate future. American missionaries have been slaughtered in Pao Ting Fu since that place became the temporary residence of the imperial household. If the Chinese Government cannot protect life and property within arm's length of its chief seat, what probability is there that foreign interests will be protected throughout the empire? American Consul General Goodnow, of Shanghai, estimates that 40,000 or 50,000 native Christians have been massacred in the interior in the last few weeks. This estimate is very likely exaggerated, but beyond question much Christian blood has been spilled. It is difficult to see how the Chinese Government as at present constituted, the anti-foreign element being in power and the chief anti-foreign leaders daily receiving promotions and honors, can give any complete recompense for past deeds with which it is in sympathy, even if it is not officially responsible for them, or any adequate assurance that similar outrages will not recur as soon as the foreign troops are withdrawn. The beginning of negotiations is comparatively simple, but the satisfactory conclusion of them will involve the solution of some dark and mysterious problems. It would be natural enough for the administration to desire to get all of our forces out of China before the election, in order that their presence there might not be used for campaign purposes in support of the anti expansion argument. But the American people, we believe, are not prepared to indorse any action in which it appears that we are shirking our share of the responsibility. China's day of reckoning has come. It may not mean partition. It ought not to mean that, but it means stern measures of some sort in the interest of humanity and civilization, and it is as much our business as anybody's to see that the problem is solved right.

The Prohibition party is not allowing the Republican and Democratic parties to do all the canvassing and to excite all the political enthusiasm in this campaign. It is making a "campaign of education" along with the others. It is running a special train with its candidates, John G. Wooley and Henry B. Metcalf, and has its itinerary mapped out on rather an extensive scale. Along with the presidential and vice-presidential candidates are other leading speakers, and also reporters of the great dailies. Their meetings are said to be attended by great crowds of people, who listen with interest, and with demonstrations of sympathy and approval to the utterances of these distinguished speakers. Chairman Oliver W. Stewart, who is managing the campaign, is throwing a great deal of vigor into it, and it is believed that by the time of the election, Mr. Wooley will have spoken over a wider territory and to greater audiences than any other Prohibition candidate for the office has ever done in the history of the country. Mr. Wooley is himself a speaker of remarkable power, and we are not suprised to learn that large audiences greet him wherever he is announced to speak. It is only right that the people should give his party a fair hearing along with the others, for it is presenting an issue that must sooner or later be faced in a very practical way by the American people. Some of the issues presented in this campaign will probably be dead issues in coming campaigns, but the problem of the liquor traffic in this country is one which is destined to be a living issue until some satisfactory solution is reached. Like Banquo's ghost, it will not down, not even at the bidding of those politicians who believe that moral issues have no legitimate place in a political campaign. Prohibitionists, however, insist that their issue is not only a moral one, but an economic and social problem of far-reaching importance. All they ask is for the public to give them a fair hearing and then vote conscientiously.

A few weeks ago the city of Odessa, in Russia, witnessed an anti-Jew riot, the story of which, so far as the writer has observed, has not gotten into the papers. Russian soldiers were being hastily gathered from village and farm into Odessa, the chief port on the Black Sea, to be transported to China. Many of them, leaving home on short notice and for an indefinite period, brought with them many of their civilian possessions, hoping to dispose of them to the second hand dealers. The Jews bought willingly until their stocks were overcrowded and they had no more money left. Then, one Sunday evening (July 29), trouble arose between a soldier who wished to sell and a Jew who would not buy. Other soldiers and other Jews joined the fray. The rabble of the street, always prompt to seize upon any pretext for beating the Jews, re-enforced the soldiers and virtually took the case out of their hands. All night the row continued, and it was a very one-sided battle, as a fight against the Jews always is. Monday morning there were about two hundred and fifty Jews in the hospital. All day Monday the disorder continued intermittently. A band of rioters would suddenly appear. The crowd would withdraw into doorways and passages as they rushed down the street shouting blood-curdling Russian imprecations against Israel. The windows of stores kept by Jews were broken in and articles dragged out and broken on the pavement. The little kiosks for the sale of papers and obacco, being mostly kept by Jews, were perturned, smashed, or carried off bodily. Throughout the whole period of disorder the clice took no part, except occasionally to warn the leaders of the mob away from some shop which was not kept by a Jew. There were no arrests. Such is the life of the Jew in Russia.

THE MISSOURI CHRISTIAN CONVENTION.

The thirty-sixth annual convention of the Missouri Christian Co-operation was held at Moberly last week, beginning on Monday he 17th and closing on Thursday the 20th. The convention was not seriously affected by the proximity of the coming National Convention, as was feared, though no doubt the attendance was to some extent cut lown by this fact. Moberly is so happily ocated for a convention that it is not difficult to secure an attendance there, and our annual conventions in Missouri have been occasions of such interest in the past that it is hardly possible to stampede one of them by even so great an attraction as one of our national conventions.

The afternoon of Monday was occupied by the introductory session of the Christian Woman's Board of Missions, which proved to be a well-attended and most delightful session. Mrs. F. M. Lowe, of Kansas City, presided and delivered her presidential message. We must rely, however, on one of the sisters to make a full report of their convention. It was, we believe, satisfactory in every way, and the report of the corresponding secretary, Mrs. L. G. Bantz, of St. Louis, was highly satisfactory, showing the best year's work in the history of the C. W. B. M. in the state, which covers a period of twenty-one years.

On Monday evening the introductory session of the Missouri Christian Convention was held. In the absence of the president, W. A. Oldham, who did not arrive until the following morning, T. P. Haley presided in his own happy way. The song service was led by W. E. M. Hackleman, who led the singing throughout the convention, and the devotional service for the evening was led by W. F. Hamann, of St. Louis. The address of the evening was by the editor of this paper on "A Century's Triumphs," which was followed by the singing of "America" and a half hour of social greetings.

Tuesday morning President Oldham took the chair, which he occupied throughout the sessions of the convention, presiding with dignity and impartiality over all the proceedings. After devotional services, conducted by J. P. Pinkerton, of Jefferson City. a happy word of welcome was spoken by the pastor of the church, S. B. Moore, which was responded to by the president, who based his remarks on the scriptural phrase, "All the saints salute you." The report of the Bible school work was presented by H. F. Davis, of St. Louis, while the report of the state board was made by its corresponding secretary, T. A. Abbott. Followa summary of the more important figures in the report:

The figures representing amounts given for "Missions Outside the State" need revising to bring them up to date, as the amounts for some of these have been considerably swelled since the report was made. The most disappointing feature of the report is the $5,000 contributed to state mission work during the eleven months, between the last convention and the present one. While this is an improvement over last year, it is by no means what we have a right to expect from the churches in the state of Missouri. When we remember that only about four hundred churches in the state are contributing with any regularity to our co-operative work, leaving nearly one thousand doing nothing in this direction, it is not difficult to see where the trouble lies. The largest and gravest problem before the brotherhood of Missouri is how to enlist these unenlisted churches, not for the treasury's sake alone, but for their own sake, and how to put them under such religious instruction as will result, not only in their practical co-operation, but in their growth in all the elements of spiritual power. An effort was made to bring this problem before the convention in more than one of the addresses, and in the report of the committee on the State of the Cause, but there was lack of time for the proper consideration of the question, and an evident failure on the part of many to grasp the magnitude of the problem, and to see the gravity of the situation. The matter was laid over for consideration during the year, to be reported on by the Ways and Means committee at our next convention. Let those who feel a deep interest in the welfare of our cause in this state ponder well

The forenoon of Tuesday, was closed with a sermon on "The Magnetism of the Cross,"

by R. Linn Cave, of Independence, preceded by an impressive devotional service, led by Andrew Scott, of Butler. Brother Cave's address greatly moved the convention, illustrating anew the power of the cross to sway the human heart.

The afternoon of Tuesday was occupied, by a very profitable session of the Christian Woman's Board of Missions, and in the evening a very beautiful and tender address was given by Miss Adelaide G. Frost, of Mahoba, India. F. O. Fannon, of St. Louis, followed with a very strong appeal for pledges in support of the woman's work.

Wednesday was largely occupied with the report of committees, and important as they were we cannot here take space to mention them in detail. At 11:30 there was a very effective sermon on "The Gospel Stairway," by B. T. Wharton, of Marshall, designed to impress the responsibility of the church to send the gospel to those who have it not.

In the afternoon F. E. Meigs, of China, made a strong address on China's present condition and the causes which have brought it about. A Missouri convention is always glad to hear Bro. Meigs.

Later, at the Memorial Hour, Brother J. A. Berry, who has served as chairman of the Obituary committee for many years, himself a venerable man of God, read his tender and beautiful tribute to those who have fallen during the year. This was followed by a memorial sermon on the Life, Character and Theological Views of Alexander Procter, by T. P. Haley, of Kansas City. This was universally regarded as a very able and very true representation of Brother Procter as he was, and its publication in pamphlet form is already called for.

At the Wednesday evening session a report of the Benevolent Association was read by J. D. Dillard, followed by a talk on the Orphans' Home by Miss Tina Williamson, assistant matron of the Home, which greatly interested the convention. The address of the evening was by J. H. Hardin who, after an absence of seven years from our state, where he labored so many years, was glad to return again, as the people of Missouri are glad to have him return. His address was on "The Paramount Importance of State Missions," and was a strong appeal for enlargement, based on the material resources of the state, on our numbers and on the nature and value of our plea. It was a matter of regret to us that we were compelled by pressing duties to leave, at this point in the convention, and were deprived of the privilege of hearing the remainder of the program. We were specially interested in the conference on "Our Country Churches," and in the addresses of J. B. Jones and S. B. Moore, of St. Louis. We understand that the next convention goes to Mexico, Missouri

The convention was handled with great ease and gracious hospitality by the Moberly church. Brother Moore, the pastor, seemed to be perfectly at home in the management of the convention as host, and made himself a willing servant of all. There were but few changes made in the organization of the co-operation, and the work will be carried forward the coming year under the same management as during the past year.

Editor's Easy Chair

One of the most common fallacies indulged in, even by intelligent people, is the idea that any given set of propositions or principles, objectively set forth in fairly intelligent language, written or spoken, ought to produce, and, as a matter of fact, do produce the same impressions and conclusions in the minds of honest readers or hearers. Nothing could be further from the truth than such an idea. The impression which any given document or oral declaration will make on any human mind will depend upon two controlling factors: First, the nature and contents of the document or declaration; and second, the nature and contents of the mind which is to be acted upon. It is this last factor which is so generally ignored. What degree of development has the mind attained? Under what sort of influences has it been formed? What are its natural aptitudes and tastes? Has it been biased or warped by erroneous teaching? And if so, by what particular type of false teaching? It is clear that all these questions have a very direct bearing on the kind of impression made, or the effect produced on any given mind by any presentation of truth. And yet, how few stop to think of this when they are weighing the probable effects of any sermon, address or plea of any kind! And how important it is to remember both these factors-the subjective and the objective-in our efforts to influence the public mind for good. It would often save us very sad disappointment as to the results of our efforts if we would give due consideration, not only to the matter we have to present, but to the condition and attitude of mind to which we have to present it.

The fact mentioned above explains a thing that often pesters some good people not a little. When they hear any one speak of the progress of theology, and of the changes it has undergone in the past, and must undergo in the future, they ask in astonishment whether the Word of God is not abiding, and whether Jesus Christ is not the same, yesterday, to-day and forever? Undoubtedly; but the capacity of the human mind and its spiritual preparation for understanding the Word, and for appreciating Christ, are not "the same, yesterday, to-day and forever," and hence the product of the human mind in different ages acting upon the same objective standard of truth, is not the same. It could not be the same unless the two factors which determine the product were the same, and this we know is not the case. As men advance in Christian life and character, they are better prepared to understand the Word of God which is very wide and very deep. By doing the truth we come to know the doctrine. While theology has heen called the "queen of the sciences," it is a science, nevertheless, and is a progressive science. Show us a man whose theology does not change and we will show you one whose knowledge does not increase and whose spiritual life is not being enlarged. Why should any one demur at the idea that theology is progressive on the ground that "we get our theology from the Bible?" The man who so objects shows that he has forgotten one of the factors which have a controlling influence in determining our theology, namely, the subjective factor—the degree of Christian knowledge and of Christian life—possessed by those who go to the Scriptures for their theology.

There is another conclusion to be drawn from the premises laid down in the foregoing, which is of great practical value. It follows from what we have said that men ought to be very charitable in their judgments of each other. There are those, of course, who do not love the truth so well as their own opinions, or their own party, and who stubbornly close their minds against new ideas. All such are, of course, condemned by Christ and may wisely be left alone in their self-chosen ignorance. But not all who love the truth are able to reach the same conclusions as to what the truth is. Early education, environment and individual peculiarities have had their effect upon us all, and we cannot think independently of these influences which have more or less shaped our minds. The mind is the instrument with which we ascertain what is truth and what is duty, and the condition of that instrument is not the same in all persons. This makes a variety of views on every great question of human interest inevitable. It is just what might be expected, in view of the different types of mind, the different degrees of culture and the different influences which have operated upon us. Since this is inevitable, it follows that we cught to be very charitable towards each other and not condemn one another because of differences of opinion. Every man, who is a true man, must be loyal to the truth as he is able to understand the truth, and it is far more important to our salvation, and to progress in religious thought, that we be loyal to our convictions of right, than that we be uniform in our opinions and conclusions. No man will be condemned for honest mistakes, but if one be not obedient to the heavenly vision of truth, he is condemned already by his own conscience.

But does not this show that Christian union is impracticable? No, it does not show that Christian union, as taught in the New Testament is impracticable, that is, union in Christ; but it does show the impossibility of any union of Christendom based on any formulation of human doctrine. It does not show the impracticability of making Christ our common Leader, and of being united in personal loyalty to Him, for such a union as that did actually exist in the apostolic church in spite of differences of opinion on many questions of doctrine. The practicability of such a union is furthermore illustrated in the history of our own movement, which makes faith in Christ and loyalty to Him the bond of unity and no agreement in theological views. Now an then some among us have so far departer from the spirit of our movement as to make their opinions tests of fellowship, but the have not succeeded in drawing away many disciples after them. It is a remarkable fact that men of all degrees of culture, or all varieties of opinion, can find a real and essential unity and brotherhood in Christ They can love each other in spite of their differences of views, while they seek to help each other to larger and clearer views of truth and of duty. This seems to be the only possible way for the realization of that unity for which our Lord prayed. reason why it has not been realized before is, that we have not been broad enough and Christian enough to make allowances for differences of opinion, and to find our bond of unity in a common Lord and Savior, rather than in a common platform of doctrinal opinions and speculations. We can only grow into unity by growing in spiritual stature and by coming into fellowship with Christ's thought and spirit. When this is done then will Christ's prayer for the unity of His disciples be fulfilled.

GOOD WORKS AND ALMSDEEDS.

(Jas. 1:27; Acts 9:36-39; 1 John 3:16-18.) (Concert of prayer for benevolences.)

[Uniform Midweek Prayer-meeting Topic October 3.]
CENTRAL TRUTH: Human salvation is the result of divine philanthropy, and those who are saved are to manifest this salvation in deeds of benevolence to their fellowmen.

The Bible is an exceedingly practical book, and the religion which Christ taught is pre-eminently practical in its character. It is a divine force coming into human life and turning all its energies and activities into channels of benevolence. It is not a set of theories that have to do with the head alone, but it is a life manifesting its presence and character in doing good to others. Take away the benevolent feature of Christianity and there is not enough left to commend it as a religion for humanity.

James, in his practical way, declares that pure and undefiled religion consists in visiting the fatherless and widows in their affliction and in keeping one's self unspotted from the world. Judged by this practical test, it is to be feared that the religion of many a man in "good standing and full fellowship" in orthodox churches would be found sadly wanting. Many suppose that if their creed is orthodox, if they attend the stated meetings of the church, pay toward its expenses and keep their lives reasonably moral, their religion is of an unquestioned type. But lacking this feature of benevolence which manifests itself in kindly care for the widow and orphan, for the homeless and helpless, it cannot bear the searchlight of God's Word. It needs vitalization by the Spirit of Christ, which is the spirit of benevolence.

The importance attached to this spirit of benevolence everywhere in the Scriptures is illustrated by the incident recorded in the passage cited above from Acts. The town of Joppa over on the Mediterranean coast has been made famous because of a humble woman named Dorcas, who lived there, and who, in the expressive language of the inspired writer, "was full of good works and almsdeeds which she did." She had sickened and died, and so great was the grief and sense of loss occasioned by her death, that the disciples of that city sent off to Lydda where Peter was and brought him there. When the apostle entered the upper chamber where the body of the good woman was lying in state, "all the widows stood by him weeping and showing the coats and garments which Dorcas made while she was with them." These were the mute and eloquent witnesses of her useful life. They tell more than mere words could tell the true character of the woman. Peter restored her to life, and she, no doubt, continued her good work, and her name has been preserved wherever the gospel record has gone, in benevolent societies and in the church. Her needle is still at work for the widows and orphans in all lands, so great and so immortal is the influence of a life "full of good works and almsdeeds." Her opportunities were, no doubt, limited, but to the utmost of her ability she made use of them to bless others. Are we doing the same? Are the lives of any of the widows and orphans of our day made happier and better by service we have rendered?

Christianity had its origin in this spirit of self-sacrifice for others. As John declares: "Hereby know we love, because he laid down his life for us: and we ought to lay down our lives for the brethren." This seems to be sound logic. If our lives were redeemed by Christ, who laid down His life for us, then it would seem to follow that we ought to lay down our lives, not necessarily in death, but in loving service for our fellowmen. But is it not possible for one to love God and yet be indifferent to the cries of the hungry and naked? John says not: "But whoso hath the world's goods, and beholdeth his brother in need, and shutteth up his compassion from him, how doth the love of God abide in him?" When we consider the large number of neg lected children, growing up in ignorance and vice for the want of Christian care and training, we are made to realize the need of a revival of "the pure and undefiled religion," such as the New Testament writers insist upon.

There is great danger that many of us will do as the Apostle John exhorts us not to do when he says: "Let us not love in word, neither with the tongue; but in deed and truth." The tendency to allow our religion to run into talk is very manifest, and the only corrective is in giving greater emphasis to the necessity of good works or benevolent deeds as the proof of our love for God and our fellowmen.

In the famine in India, in the recent disaster at Galveston and in the ever-present and ever-pressing needs of the fatherless, homeless and the helpless all about us, we have the incentive and the occasion for the exercise of that benevolence without which our religion is vain.

PRAYER.

O God, our Father, we thank Thee that Thou hast shown Thy love for the race in giving us Thy only begotten Son to live among us and die for us. We thank Thee for the spirit of philanthropy which Thou hast shown toward our sinning and suffering race through all the ages of the past. Having been the recipients of Thy love and kindness, may we, Thy children, who have known Thy love, manifest our appreciation thereof by deeds of kindness and benev-volence to all our fellowmen, and especially to the more unfortunate, to the poor and needy, to the fatherless and the widow, and so sharing in Thy work of benevolence here, may we also share in the glory of our Savior in the world to come. In His name. Amen!

Questions and Hnswers.

Will you please give me your understanding of the following two passages of Scripture, which I am unable to understand:

- 1. Luke 3:16, 17.
- 2. Matt. 12:43-45.

John Childers.

1. The first passage cited above reads in the Revised Version, American edition, as follows:

"John answered saying unto them all, I indeed baptize you with water; but there cometh He that is mightier than I, the latchet of whose shoes I am not worthy to unloose: He shall baptize you in the Holy Spirit and in fire: whose fan is in His hand, thoroughly to cleanse his threshing-floor and to gather the wheat into His garner, but the chaff He will burn up with unquenchable fire."

John draws a contrast between his own baptism in water and that baptism in the Holy Spirit which Christ was to bestow. John's work was preparatory. He was preparing the way for Him who alone would baptize in the Spirit. The prophet Joel had spoken of the new dispensation that was to come as characterized by the copiousness of its spiritual blessing. Peter, on the day of Pentecost, quoted Joel as saying:

"And it shall be in the last days, saith God, I will pour forth of my Spirit upon all flesh:
And your sons and your daughters shall prophesy,

And your young men shall see visions,
And your old men shall dream dreams:
Yea, on my servants and on my handmaidens in those days

Will I pour forth of my Spirit, And they shall prophesy."

It is reasonable to suppose that John referred to the same thing which Joel describes and which Peter says had the beginning of its fulfillment on the great Pentecost following Christ's resurrection. This would seem to make baptism in the Holy Spirit the supreme characteristic of the Christian dispensation, and this is no doubt the case, whether one understands that the outpouring of the Spirit on Pentecost, repeated afterwards at Cæsarea, were events that stand out by themselves as introducing the spiritual dispensation among the Gentiles and Jews respectively, or whether what there transpired in connection with miraculous phenomena occurs perpetually in its essential nature and power without the extraordinary accompaniments.

The baptism in fire is understood by some to refer to the destruction of the wicked, and by others as referring to the cleansing power of the Spirit, or to those fiery trials by which the soul is purified and made meet for the Master's use. The last phrase, referring to the separation of the wheat from the chaff, the garnering of the former and the burning up of the latter, makes it natural to understand this baptism in fire as referring to the destruction of the wi ked. The language, however, is capable of a wider meaning, namely, the separation of the evil which is in every man from the good that there is in him, and the destruction of the former by what is here metaphorically termed "fire." We say this is a broader meaning because it includes also the idea of the ultimate destruction of the wicked from whom sin can not be separated. What John means is that when Christ came He would quicken and strengthen the spirits of men by the Holy Spirit; that He would by a sifting process separate the evil from the good, the false from the true, and destroy the former and preserve the latter. This process is still going on wherever the gospel of Christ is being preached and the power of God is manifest in the lives and conduct of men.

2. The second passage reads in the Revised Version: "But the unclean spirit when he is gone out of the man, passeth through waterless places, seeking rest and findeth it not. Then he saith, I will return unto my house whence I came out: and when he is come he findeth it empty, swept and garnished. Then goeth he and taketh with himself seven other spirits more evil than himself, and they enter in and dwell there: and the last state of that man becometh worse than the first. Even so shall it be also unto this evil generation."

Not to lenter here into the question of demonology, the spiritual teaching of the passage seems to be that it is not enough for a man to get rid of an unclean spirit or an unclean heart, as we would put it, perhaps, but that the heart must be filled with pure thou hts, pure aims and objects, pure aspirations and desires, otherwise the evil spirit will return and bring with it others, and man's last condition is worse than the first. It was a warning to the generation of Jews to whom he was speaking, that their rejection of Him who was sent to deliver them from the power of the evil one would leave them in a worse condition than they were before-a prophecy which has been fulfilled in the history of the Jews. Woe unto the man or generation that rejects Him who alone can fill the heart and satisfy its everlasting yearnings and keep it true and pure! What is said concerning the unclean spirit passing "through waterless places seeking rest and finding it not," has reference to theories prevalent at the time concerning spiritual possession according to which disembodied spirits roamed in desolate uninhabited regions.

BIBLE SCHOOLS AT STATE UNIVERSITIES.

WILLET M. HAYS.

The college number of the Christian-Evangelist displayed the large and varied interests of schools of the brotherhood in a more effective way than the present writer has before enjoyed. It is suggested that Secretary Van Kirk tabulate the leading facts about our schools and prepare them for publication and thus better prepare the brotherhood to discuss more intelligently our special educational interests in the Kansas City meeting. A tabular statement of the growth of the present membership of the brotherhood, alongside the facts regarding colleges in the respective states would also be of interest.

A few words about the situation in the Middle Northwest cannot fail to be of inter-Wisconsin, Minnesota and the two Dakotas have been slow in gaining a strong membership. They have no special school, the start at a school at Excelsior, twenty miles from Minneapolis, having been destroyed by a fire which burned the college building several years ago. This region is at present tributary to Drake and Cotner Universities, but so far away that institutions make very slow headway getting students from the superb high schools, universities and agricultural colleges of these states. The schools of other denominations also have the advantage of nearness to the homes of the brotherhood and they, no doubt, secure some of the patronage which might go to our own special schools.

All this appears very unfortunate, but there is another side to the situation. Modern educational developments have created new conditions; and enterprises we inaugurate may be made to fit into what seems to be a permanent arrangement of public educational institutions. These states have been largely developed since the introduction of public high schools. The academy was not generally founded in these states because the people co-operated on a more nearly universal basis under public laws and developed the high school as the medium for giving education of a secondary grade to all who wish to drink freely of the fountain of knowledge. Neither were there founded many sectarian colleges-most of which in their earlier stages must of necessity occupy themselves largely with education of the high school or secondary grade.

Some colleges were inaugurated by the Methodists, Congregationalists, etc., in earlier decades, and some denominations are yet starting small general colleges. But the state universities and agricultural colleges are predominant in the college field. Minnesota's State University and Agricultural College, at Minneapolis, had an enrollment last year of 3,300, and Wisconsin's combined institution at Madison was only a few hundred behind. In each of the Dakotas the agricultural colleges and universities are separate and each of these four young institutions has several hundred students and is rapidly growing. The trend here is for the youth to seek their education in the public and state schools. Shall we build separate schools, or shall we devise a system under which we can have a co-operative plan, taking the advantage of the public and state schools for our own youth, and giving of our Christian education to a wider circle of students than go from our own homes?

It would seem that our general policy will be adopted within the next decade, and we should have intelligent discussion that the best possible policy may be entered upon.

Since in Minnesota the educational movement first took form, here would seem the place for the first effort at a solution under the new and apparently permanent plan of public and state schools. And since the burning of the college at Excelsior, sentiment has in part crystallized against the plan of a separate college, and in favor of a Bible school adjacent to and informally associated with the State University in Minneapolis and its large agricultural school in a suburban town. Some good brethren have misgivings, but most of those who are acquainted with the conditions favor devising a plan and inaugurating a Bible school beside the university.

There are no special Bible studies offered in the university, but the ancient languages are taught and the Bible is used for language instruction. The tendency to broad simplicity in modern Christian affairs is shown here. The Y. M. C. A. and the Y. W. C. A. each carry on instruction in religious subjects, and do much to prepare young people for Christian living and Christian leadership. Classes taught by advanced students have a regular organization under the college section of the national organization, and courses of lectures by prominent Association workers are employed part of the year. The Christian students believe in these large state institutions and, believing also in Christian education, they are seeking it for themselves. There is more genuine Christianity in our state universities than is commonly understood, and it is increasing.

The state and private donors are building up a fine equipment of faculty, buildings and apparatus and the institution spends about $300,000 annually in giving instruction and in conducting research work in agriculture and general science. If there were a demand created by adjacent Bible schools, no doubt the instruction in ancient languages, history, etc., would be strengthened and students desiring to prepare for professional religious work would thus have very superior opportunities in these studies. Possibly the languages of countries to which our missionaries go could be introduced, and arrangements might be made for the university's medical department to give instruction in medicine, surgery and sanitation to prospective missionaries. The large general universities appeal very strongly to popular support and patronage. State legislatures are liberal in their appropriations, private donors are giving endowments by the hundreds of thousands, and the public high schools are so articulated with the universities that the student's natural course is from graduation at the high school to the freshman class in some general or technica college in the university. Years ago, wealthy people sent their sons to Yale and other Eastern colleges; now they are proud of their own Western institutions and see not reason for passing them by. But that these institutions are neither aristocratic nor expensive is proved by the fact that in a large city like Minneapolis, nearly one-half the university students find and use opportunities while in school of largely earning their expenses.

These large schools secure some students who are not our best stock, but the majority of them are of the brighter and better boys and girls from the farm, village and city homes. They are nearly the same material forming the student body of smaller colleges. What can we do for them? Is it better to plan to keep our young people away from the well-equipped laboratories. the agricultural lecture-rooms, and highly specialized faculties of these large institutions which we all gladly support? Shall we put our village and farm boys and girls into our smaller colleges which, owing to the excessive cost of instruction in science and agriculture, must be too largely literary and biblical in their curriculum to suit our youth who are to be farmers, tradesmen, artisans and professional workers? Can we not devise a plan under which large numbers of our youth may prepare in the public and state schools to take a strong position in the industries and professions of practical life, and we at the same time reach many more young college people with special religious instruction and keep around them religious influences? Can we not also lead some of these young people to make a specialty of religious work during their college and graduate courses and become strong preachers and missionaries? Can we not in addition to this exert a large influence on the university life by an organization beside the university, which magnifies religion, right living and the future life?

What shall be the form of such an organization? How much will it cost? What shall be its line of work? What shall be its relation to the university? What peculiar qualifications are needed by its executive and teachers? What will other religious bodies say and do? How shall the money for an endowment be secured? These are questions which must be solved locally, but the best wisdom of the best men in the entire brotherhood will be needed to aid.

The popularity of the Y. M. C. A. in the University of Minnesota proper, and in its agricultural boarding-school of four hundred students at university farm, three miles from the university campus, shows that religion enters very s'rongly into the university life. President Northrup, an active worker in the Congregational Church, has expressed admiration for the Disciples, because, under the general tendency of the times for a return to primitive Christianity, they, more than any other denomination, have represented what the people have been educated to want by such broadening influences as the Y. M. C. A., Y. W. C. A. and the C. E. It is a 'good thing" that its plea for primitive forms and freedom from creeds and ecclesiastical forms of Christianity is giving the Disciple brotherhood such wonderful growth. is there another religious body which a secnlar board of regents could afford to be so friendly with? Organically this brothernood is little more objectionable than a Y.M.C.A. college association. It is the Church around which the coming unity of action may best be centered. Have we the wise eaders who are capable of giving our movement that paramount position which it deserves in the restoration movement? While asking concessions of the denominations. what minor differences have we which we can concede for the larger unity on essentials? Is our plea large enough, sufficiently free of contested points of minor weight, so that we can assume to enter our public universities as teachers, not of sectarianism, but simply of Christianity? If it is, let us make a plan, give our money and choose wise men to carry forward the work in a way to win all men. The soil is ripe beside these institutions for planting a university church, biblical college, and Christian student's home and social center, not to supplant but to supplement the Christian Association work; and to be in better position to further crystallize church organization about the simple yet all important essentials.

Such an organization will not take the place of our separate denominational colleges, but will supplement them in a field otherwise not occupied, or left open to be pre-empted by others who could not work on so broad a plan as we. Here we would be held up to the light, and the light would show us our weaknesses and at the same time wonderfully illuminate our plea.

RELIGION.

BY BEN GREENSTEIN.

What queer ideas people have and entertain concerning this all-important, captivating theme. They are confused, they are mistaken, they are ignorant, they are thoughtless, they are careless. They seem to think that religion is the exclusive property (by patent or copyright for an indefinite term) of the crafty and designing priesthood. Others think that it is something to amuse the children or to console the aged who are about to die, something fit for the unfortunate and weak-minded; a delightful theme for the female world to dwell upon. As people sometimes intently watch the panorama of religious hyprocrisy they come to the conclusion that it is a hoax or a mammoth farce. There are others who think that religion is too abstract, too vague and shadowy, as they call it; that it is too impractical for a utilitarian age like ours; that it is a thing of the academy and not of the home; a thing for the perplexing philosopher rather than for the weary laborer; that it lies in the jurisdiction of the technical controversialist rather than for the untechnical practitioner; something for the rare-bookhunter rather than for the up-to-date domestic library. Among a good many people religion is a fad that changes at every full moon, something like a Parisian dress. Again, among the more philosophically inclined there seems to be an opinion that religion emanated from superstition by a slow and sacred process of evolution. But these are opinions and only opinions.

What is religion? What is it? It is not a code of antiquated lavs and customs. It is not a philosophical disertation, nor an abstract system of metaphysics, nor an abstract system of psychology. It is not a science of ethics, nor an encyclopedia of moral precepts. It is not a spectral theory of eschatology. Again, religion is not eccessiology or church membership, although in some churches it is a necessary qualification. If religion is not all these, then again I ask, What is it?

It is not a study, but a life. It is not knowing about God, but it is living with God. It is not an objective thought, but it is a subjective life. It is the communion of the human with the divine. It is not a precept, but a practice. The contemplation of God in the human mind is theology; but the realization of God in the human soul is religion. Religion is the subject, theology is the predicate. One is a consistent life, the other a systematic study. The head is the medium of communication with theology, the heart is the communicative organ of religion. Religion is simplicity, theology is complexity. One leads to concord, the other to discord. All sectarian bodies unite on the subject of religion, but the subject of theology divides the people into sectarian bodies.

In all religions there are two distinct, yet dependent ideas. The first idea which, like the Copernican sun, is the center of all religious ideas, is, is the existence of God capable of self-revelation? This is the Alpha of all religions; the very life of religion depends on this idea. Take it away and you have despairing and despondent atheism. Take it away and behold mystery, triumphant mystery. The second idea is the correlative compliment of the first, namely, the existence of the soul capable of receiving divine revelations of God's self. This elevates man from his dumb associates, the beasts. It gives the science of anthropology a spiritual element. Man is a religious animal. Man will worship something in spite of himself, which proves conclusively that the stamp of divinity is indelibly impressed on his nature. As the tendency of water is downward, so man's tendency is Godward. Both are natural. True, there are certain impediments in man's nature which temporarily check this tendency. The soul seeks God, God seeks the soul. "For such-the sincere and spiritual-the Father seeketh to worship him." There is a natural spiritual affinity between the two. And now, what is the medium whereby the two seekers are better enabled to hold communion? Faith, appropriating faith, in the dual nature and object of his divine incarnation, which culminated in the atonement. Christ was man; Christ was God. He was man's son; he was God's Son. was Heaven's ambassador in our foreign world. He now is our ambassador in a foreign world, heaven. Now, when he died he died in a dual representative capacity. As God's Son he placed God's hand in man's, and as man's son he placed man's hand in God's. He was the only one entitled to do this because he was the only one with a dual nature. God and man are natural seekers after each other. But there is an obstructive impediment between these two. Communion has been broken. A breach of companionship has taken place. The two are at emnity. Something is the matter. What is it? It is sin. But Christ's death now comes in and through it offers a reconciliation. He has opened the way once more for the two natural seekers to come together. This is the at-one-ment. And now what is religion? It is the at-one-ment with God. And faith is the grace that binds the soul with the soul's God.

THE ADMINISTRATION OF BAPTISM.

W. E. HARLOW.

Let all things be done decently and in order, is a scriptural injunction, and of its application to the above subject I desire to offer a few suggestions. No one engaged in evangelistic work can fail to see the need of properly administering this sacred rite. We need not wonder that some people abhor the publicity of going into the water when they have witnessed the watersplashing, strangling and bungling process of those who make so much of the "mode" and yet do not know how properly to administer it. As a people I believe the Disciples have the best baptists of any church on earth, and yet my experience and observation is that a large portion of our preachers (and not all of them young ones either) have something to learn on this subject before their practice will very forcibly recommend the ordinance to either the sinner or the sectarian. I have witnessed some very disgraceful scenes by preachers who have been long enough in the work to know better, and whose actions in the water did more against the form of baptism than all the preaching for it that the evangelist could do in a month. When a minister of the glorious gospel of our risen Lord will thoughtlessly or otherwise in the presence of a curious, gaping crowd, as nearly always attend su h occasions, put his arms around a lady candidate as he leads her in or out of the water, and while dipping her take her by the nape of the neck so hard that his finger prints are left for half an hour afterwards, and slam her down in the water hard enough to be heard all over a large church, and strangle her besides, it seems to me that some one ought to teach him the way of the Lord more perfectly. Others seem to have an aversion to burying, as they fail to put their subjects out of sight. I have seen women baptized and the curl not taken out of their bangs nor their elbows out of sight. Some have never learned what position either they or the candidate should occupy in the action, so that one unacquainted with the rite could hardly tell who was being baptized, the preacher or candidate.

While it is a gladsome sight to witness a burial in baptism, yet it ought to be a sacred and solemn scene, which will commend rather than repel. A pastor is sometimes very sensitive on this point, and the evangelist hardly dares to offer a suggestion. I believe our colleges ought to give as thorough instructions in the performance of the action of baptism as they do on its design. A proper application of a principle is of far greater import than simple theory. I spent a summer month a few years ago in a meeting with one of our young preachers who had not as yet baptized any one. We went bathing several times in a river with other friends, and I there and then taught him how to baptize. He has since become a very successful evangelist and one of the best baptists I ever saw. Let me here offer a few suggestions that will aid young preachers (and others, too, who have not before learned) in attending to this most beautiful symbol. First, never allow the baptismal committee to instruct your candidates. It always tends to raise doubts in their minds and makes them afraid, and they come to the water trembling and expecting to be half drowned. Take your time, never get excited nor in a hurry. Lead your subject slowly, holding her or him by the arm as you would on the street, till you reach the place; give no instructions whatever further than that you will take care of them. If it be a man tell him when about ready to stiffen his whole person, as they will sometimes sit down or "jack knife" on you. Stand on the left of your subject and as far back as you can, so that when you lay your subject down you will be in no strain. In one of my meetings the pastor, a small man, and one of the best men on earth, had not learned this point of standing back, and always stood close up to the side of the candidate. I told him he would have trouble sometime, but it was a wellfixed custom with him and he heeded not the advice. Before the meeting was over he was baptizing a rather large lady and the baptistery (as most of them are) was not very deep and not full at that. When he went to raise her he was in his usual and much beloved strain, when she, thinking to aid him, tried to help herself up by stepping back and in so doing knocked his feet from under him, and they both went under. He did no more baptizing in that meeting. I always take a handkerchief (for ladies), in my left hand while they take the same wrist with both their hands and the only thing I tell them is to "keep hold tight," then after the ceremony place my right hand between their shoulder blades and lower them as gently as I would lay a sleeping babe upon a bed, putting them entirely out of sight and raising them with the same deliberation. Hold them by the left arm until you have the water out of their eyes and they get a breath, then slowly lead them, holding on to them, till you leave them safely in the hands of the committee. Have a respectable ceremony and vary it occasionally so as to not become monotonous. It may be lawful to use a ceremony I heard a young preacher use in baptizing, but it is not expedient. Standing with one hand on the hands of the candidate, with eyes wide open he would say: "In the name of the Father, Son and Holy Ghost I baptize you." No amen, but a pushing backward process which to me seemed almost sacrilegious. Always have plenty of water if possible, take plenty of time, do it in decency and in order, and thus glorify its Author.

ALWAYS ABOUNDING IN THE WORK OF THE LORD.

BAXTER WATERS.

"Abounding" suggests fullness, plenty, fruitfulness. The Christian life abounds in the work of the Lord. It is a Spirit-filled life; a God-filled life; hence it is an enthusiasm, a passion and a zeal which burns and glows. The Christian life is an inspiration, a life directed and inspired by the living God, and it always finds its expression in good works. As the architect gives form to his plans; the artist to his ideals; the musician to his harmonies; the good man out of the good treasure of his heart brings forth that which is good. As the streams abound with fishes; as the trees in the garden are rich with fruitage; as the soil is resourceful in varying harvests; as the mines underneath the hills abound in wealth; as the ocean beds heave up gems and treasures; such is the life of the man who abounds in the work of the Lord. He sows beside all waters; he sends out good deeds as ships of merchandise; he pays in coin of thoughtful services things which make for happiness: he cheers men along the way, and like love, he "never faileth." He perseveres and pushes, tries and triumphs, until we declare we believe in the "final perseverance of the saints."

Now the inspiration for this zeal the Apostle Paul found in the assurance that this work is "not in vain in the Lord." This exhortation (1 Cor. 15:58) is the conclusion of that powerful discourse on immortality and a personal resurrection. We shall live and our works will follow us. And everything we do bears the stamp of immortality. God will establish the work of our hands. He will take the feeble efforts and weave them into the eternal "forces that make for righteousness." There shall never be one lost good. Every effort put forth shall count. No effort, no matter how feeble, put forth in the spirit of the Master is ever lost. It is not in vain in the Lord. Not death but resurrection! Not mortality but immortality! Not defeat but victory! Our lives are grounded deep in the very being of Goda God not of the dead but of the living. Our deeds are wrought out in his very presence-wrought in God. He it is that "worketh in us both to will and to do." So should we build into this eternal temple the virtues that shine and abide. What a noble incentive to live for the things that perish not. For life is not a fragment but a unity; not broken but continuous; not limited to earth but unbounded-"a building of God eternal in the heavens." Let us live in hope.

THE RIGHT HAND OF FEL-LOWSHIP.

D. A. WICKIZER.

We many times use terms that are exceedingly comprehensive and embrace much in the full scope of their meaning, in a very narrow and limited sense. Without discuss ing the propriety of the custom among us in extending the "hand of fellowship," feel that it will be profitable to study the term "fellowship" in its various meanings as used in the New Testament. The word is from koinonia and is rendered in Acts 2:42 by the word fellowship. "They continued steadfastly in the apostle's doctrine and in fellowship." In 1 Cor. 1:9 we read that we are called into the fellowship of Jesus Christ. In Gal. 2:9 we are told that they gave to Paul and Barnabas the right hand of fellowship. The reader will notice that this fellowship seems to have been given them for their aid in sending them into other fields of labor. For the full meaning of this term as understood by our translators we look at their various renderings. In 2 Cor. 9:13 we have the rendering "distribution" in the accepted version, and "contribution" in the revised. We have "contribution" as the rendering in Rom. 15:26.

An additional idea is found in 1 Tim. 6:18, where it is rendered "communicate." Literally: "To be communicative ones." In 2 Cor. 1:7 the word is rendered "partakers." "As ye are partakers of the suffering, so also are ye of the comfort." In Philemon, v. 17, it is rendered "partner;" while in Heb. 10:33 it is rendered "companion." We have still another, and perhaps the most beautiful and suggestive of all, given in 1 Cor. 10:16. Here it is rendered "communion." "The cup of blessing which we bless, is it not the communion of the blood of Christ? The bread which we break, is it not the communion of the body of Christ?"

We have, then, the following ideas in the term koinonia (fellowship) as used in the New Testament: One who is a PARTNER; one who is a COMPANION; one who is a PAR-TAKER in another's life: one who is a willing COMMUNICATOR; one who is a CONTRIBUTOR, and one who COMMUNES with another. If the church would accept and practice this larger idea of fellowship, it would greatly strengthen the power and widen the influence of the Church of Christ. When we extend, as a congregation, the right hand of fellowship or accept a person into our fellowship, we should realize that it means, we should become at once a partner, a companion with him, willing to communicate with and to contribute to aid him if in want and to commune with him in his sorrows as well as when he rejoices; to be a partaker We are members of the same with him. body, and if bound together in tois divine fellowship, from our abundance we will give to relieve; in the midst of our busy life we will find time to communicate with a brother that is discouraged and out of hearts of love and sympathy there will flow a stream, and the waters thereof will make glad the multitudes. Love, not bitter criticism; tenderness, not harshness; sympathy, Lot condemnation; this divine fellowship, not observed as simply a form, but as a vitalizing power and influence, will win the world to God, for God is love. REPORT OF C. W. B. M. STATE CONVENTION AT MOBERLY, MO.

MRS. L. G. BANTZ.

There is cause for great rejoicing over the Missouri state convention. Some fears were expressed, and with just cause, that he state meeting would suffer because the National Convention is to be held in our state, and at so near a date. The effect seemed to be to fill with greater enthusiasm han usual our Missouri brothers and sisters, and if this enthusiasm continues and gathers nomentum as it promises, surely next year will be a red-letter year in our history.

The convention was opened at 2 P. M. on Monday, the 17th, by the C. W. B. M. The ouse was comfortably filled when the presient, Mrs. T. M. Lowe, called order. Devoionals were conducted by Sister E. L. Pedlicord, of Lexington, after which the everal committees were appointed. Sister Rothwell tendered the convention a loving velcome to Moberly homes and hearts. our thanks were heartily expressed by Siser Dutcher, of Mexico.

The president's address was brief but rged all on to higher, holier efforts for Christ. Reports from the districts followed. All report some increase, both in women and noney. Every district was reported in writing, either by the manager or by proxy. The organizers, Mrs. A. S. Gilliam and Mrs. L. Moore, told of their trials and triumphs n the field. Both have done much faithful work, and have opened the way for future trongholds, we feel sure. After the closng business a reception and season of introluctions and greetings followed, which made ill feel at home among God's children.

A telegram came from Mrs. Helen E. Moses, the national secretary, which was ead after Bro. Garrison's sermon in the vening, that caused great rejoicing, which was manifested by the overflowing house with hearty clapping. The message it prought was that Missouri had sent $7,000 to the national treasury during the year, which, with $1,033.58 for state work, made er contributions over $8,000; together with a Scripture reference so applicable and so tender that our hearts were full of gratitude for the love and sympathy exsting between the national officers and the Vissouri sisterhood. Almost spontaneously we sang "Praise God from whom all blessngs flow."

On Tuesday P. M. the C. W. B. M. session was continued, opened by prayer by Miss Tena Williamson, of St. Louis. The secretary's report showed 152 auxiliaries on he roll, and 3,101 members. Twenty-eight uxiliaries organized or reorganized; fortywo life memberships, wholly or partly paid; wenty sisters reported claimed by death. Superintendent of Young People's departnent, Miss Mollie Hughes, reported 91 Junors and Mission Bands, contributing $678.21. Warrensburg won the Junior banner for the argest contribution, $50. Of the auxiliaies, Marshall took the banner for amount contributed, $240, being more than any

The treasurer reported 101 auxiliaries giving to state work, a gain of 12; a total from all sources for state work, of $1,033.58.

Mrs. C. E. Packard, of Cameron, read a paper entitled "Twenty-one Years Ago," which was a historical sketch of the first C. W. B. M. effort in our state, Cameron auxiliary being the first, organized by Miss Lou Payne. Mrs. Belle Kimball's address on "Our Juniors" was full of good practical thoughts as to this very important but neglected branch of our work. Mrs. Kimball is superintendent of the Junior Union, of St. Louis.

"Missouri's Part in the World's Conversion," by Miss Margaret Bryan Wilson, of Mexico, was a beautiful address, holding up to each individual an ideal so high, yet possible, that if we did attain, the world's conversion would be an assured fact.

Miss Mattie Burgess conducted a congress, dealing with several phases of our work. Bro. Frank Tyrrell, whom we still claim as "ours" spoke on the educational work of the C. W. B. M. in place of Mrs. Dulany, who failed to come. Mrs. Lou B. Goodnow told of our new missionaries. Mrs. A. B. Jones spoke on the better development of district and county work, and Miss Mollie Pike, on the "Quiet Hour." Our former secretary, Mrs. Virginia Hedges, conducted the closing devotional service. It made us glad to see Sister Hedges face to face once more after her long illness.

The C. W. B. M. session closed on Tuesday night with an address by our missionary, Miss Adelaide Gail Frost. Miss Frost is a quiet, unassuming speaker, yet holds the attention of her audience perfectly. An eloquent appeal by Bro. Fannon, of St. Louis, to the sisters for more consecrated and larger giving which resulted in seven life memberships, on which $62.50 were paid immediately. Two annual memberships were pledged. For state, pledges amounting to $239, and $33.65 cash was secured. We left Moberly full of good will and gratitude for the generous, whole-souled welcome tendered the convention by her pastor and his people, by the citizens and friends, and are willing to be invited there again.

The following officers were elected: President, Mrs. F. M. Lowe, Kansas City; vicepresident, Mrs. M. M. Goode, St. Joseph; recording secretary, Mrs. E. L. Longan, Kansas City; corresponding secetary, Mrs. L. G. Bantz, St. Louis; treasurer, Miss Mattie Burgess, St. Joseph; superintendent Young People's department, Miss Mollie Hughes, Independence; advisory board, Mrs. J. H. Garrison, Mrs. W. D. Harrison, St. Louis, Mrs. S. E. Lampton, Louisiana, Mrs. Edmund Wilkes, California.

Committee Meeting.

By order of Chairman, notice is hereby given of a call meeting of the Committee on Constitution, etc., appointed at Maxinkukee Assembly, and looking toward a permanent organization of the Congress of Evangelists, to be held in Kansas City, Mo., on Monday, Oct. 15, 1900. More definite announcement as to hour and place will be made from convention platform. Those knowing themselves to be members of this committee will please act accordingly.

Fiftieth Annual State Convention. Jubilee Year, Christian Church.

BLOOMINGTON, ILL., OCTOBER 2, 3, 4.

The people of the Christian Church of this city are now preparing to entertain the Jubilee State Convention of the Christian Church or the Disciples of Christ, beginning with a reception to visiting delegates Monday evening, Oct. 1st, at the church, to which all friends are invited. The program of the convention proper begins Tuesday, Oct. 2, at 9 o'clock A. M. with the proceedings of the Woman's Christian Board of Missions. The convention will continue through Thursday, Oct.

All church interests will be fully presented in this convention; State Missionary work, Christian Woman's Board of Missions, Sunday-school, Christian Endeavor and Education.

Except as otherwise indicated by the program published in this paper all meetings will be held in the Christian Church, corner of Jefferson and West Streets, and admission will be free. The general public is cordially invited.

This religious body now has in the state 793 churches, with over 100,000 members and 500 preachers; is growing rapidly and composed of enthusiastic and cultured people.

A big attendance now seems assured, and members of the local church are arranging to entertain an unusually large convention.

The president of the convention, Judge C.J. Scofield, of Carthage, who will deliver his address, Wednesday, A. M., Oct. 3, was on the Circuit Bench for several years where he won distinction. He is one of the noted lawyers of the state and his addresses are always strong and interesting.

Missionary work and service has never been in better condition, and the secretary's report will be heard with satisfaction and profit.

Mrs. Harrison, State President of Kentucky C. W. B. M., will deliver an address at the church, Tuesday evening, Oct. 2, under the auspices and in behalf of the Christian Woman's Board of Missions, a particularly effective organization in the Christian Church. Mrs. Harrison is a woman of broad culture and splendid ability. Dr. N. S. Haynes, one of the leading preachers

Dr. N. S. Haynes, one of the leading preachers of the body, and vice president of Eureka College, will deliver an address on "What Our Board Would Like to Do." Having been a strong spirit in the state missionary work he is eminently fitted to make a great speech on this topic.

Dr. Herbert L. Willett, of Chicago University, so well known in Bloomington, will deliver an address on Wednesday evening, Oct. 3, at the Coliseum, discussing the position and plea of the Christian Church. Dr. Willett has just returned from an extensive and successful lecturing tour before leading English Universities, and his many before leading English Universities, and his many friends in Bloomington will assure him a large hearing.

B. F. Jacobs, of Chicago, will speak on "The Church and the Children." Mr. Jacobs has been the children of the Linian Sunday-school work for so identified with the Union Sunday-school work for so long that his name is a household word. He c o-ducts one of the largest and most successful Sunday-schools in Chicago, at Emanuel Baptist Church.

On Thursday, Oct. 4, W. S. Carter, editor of Locomotive Firemen's Magazine, will discuss the Labor Question.

Dr. F. G. Tyrrell, of Chicago, an advanced thinker along social and economic lines, will also deliver an address, sure to command the attention of thinking people.

Other speakers of wide reputation will participate prominently in the program, and the convention throughout will be "a feast of reason and a flow of soul.'

A great many large congregations of the Christian Church are close to Bloomington, and from all over the state will come representative delegations. The prospects for a large convention are very flattoring. Enthusiastic members of the local organization are expecting an attendance well united the thousands. well up into the thousands.

All are cordially welcome to these meetings, from which both pleasure and profit are sure to be de-

Bloomington, Ill.

PRESS COMMITTEE.

Our Budget.

- -Hear the cry for help from Texas.
- -Read the appeals elsewhere, and act.
- -Illinois State Convention, Bloomington, Oct. 2-4.
- —See program elsewhere and notice some new features.
- -Everybody get ready for the great national rally at Kansas City, Oct. 12-18.
- —Let the East and the West and the North and the South com; together in our national Convention—the one place where we know no North, no South, no East, no West.
- -Kansas City brethren are doing all in their power to prepare a generous welcome for a great convention. Do not miss it.
- —Dr. H. L. Willett, of Chicago, will deliver an address at the opening exercises of Eureka College, Sept. 25th, for the year 1900-1901. We are glad to learn that present indications favor an increased attendance at Eureka College this year.
- —A series of Union Bible Class Meetings are to be held in this city Sept. 24 and 25 by Jas. M. Gray, D. D., of Boston, and Wm. R. Newell, of Chicago. The meetings will be held at the same hour in different churches in the city, one of which is to be in the First Christian Church, Sept. 24th, at 3 P. M. Mr. Newell will conduct this meeting.
- —We print elsewhere appeals from Galveston and Alvin, Texas. Our brethren in that stormswept region call upon us for help. Let us not be deaf to their cry. It is an occasion for the manifestation of brotherly love. Let us not love in word and in tongue, but in deed. Out of your abundance, brethren, send a contribution to help the "poor saints" at Galveston and Alvin.
- -The program of the Foreign Christian Missionary Society appears in this paper. This society occupies but one day, Wednesd y, at the convention, and the program indicates that it will be a day of good things; a great day. It is hoped that every preacher will be at pains to give prominent mention of our approaching general conventions at Kansas City next month and present the importance of the same to the people at every opportunity. All editors of our papers everywhere should urge the matter and wherever possible local secular papers should be used to make known the value of these gatherings. The time is short and immediate action is imperative. Publish the news; tell the glad tidings of a joyful gathering at Kansas City next month, 11-18.
- —The sixth district of Michigan will hold its annual convention in Duplain, Oct. 2-4. An excellent program has been prepared. Each S. S., C. E., C. W. B. M. Auxiliary and church is requested to select delegates at once and send the number that will attend to A. F. Currier, of Duplain, Mich. Free entertainment, good music and a well prepared program. S. A. Strawn, of Owasso, says: "Come and enjoy a good convention."
- —It is urged by the "Committee on Publicity" that all our preachers preach a sermon on the first Sunday in October on all our national missionary societies and their approaching conventions at Kansas City. This is a wise suggestion and will greatly advance the interest and attendance of the convention if carried into effect. Please read what the committee say about this in their article on the convention in this paper.
- —The poem in our Family Circle this week, by Geo. W. Archer, on "The Mutations of Time," will be enjoyed ky all who are poetically inclined. Its entiment and rythm are alike pleasing and good.

- —On September 19th there was $241,700.90 in our Extension Fund and we lack only $8,299.10 of reaching the quarter million mark. The offerings should be continued on September 30th and the first and second Sundays of October and the offerings promptly forwarded to G. W. Muckley, Kansas City, Mo., so that the accounts will reach the office for the supplementary report to the National Convention. September is too short a time in which to get the entire results of the offering and it should be continued until every missionary church is heard from.
- —W. M. Maupin, associate editor of the World Herald, Omaha, Neb., has donated 1,000 copies of his new book, "Limnings," to the Grant St. Christion Church of that city, to be sold at $1.00 each for the benefit of its mortgage debt. One half of the price of the copies sold will be applied upon the debt, the balance goes to the publisher. Bro. Maupin does not receive a cent from the sales of this 1,000 copies of his book. The book is so highly commended by literary critics that the church offers to refund the money to any purchaser not satisfied after reading with the investment. All orders for the book should be addressed to Miss Kate Crosby, 2320 N. 26th St., Omaha, Neb.
- —In this paper we publish a statement from Geo. T. Smith, of Winfield, Kan., concerning his new book, entitled "A Criticism on Higher Criticism," to which we ask the reader's attention.
- —The program of the Jubilee Convention of the Disciples of Christ in Illinois appears in this paper. The convention will be held in Bloomington, Oct. 1-4. W. E. M. Hackleman, of Indianapolis, will be leader of the music of the convention. The program is a good one and a great convention is anticipated. See letter elsewhere in this paper on the convention program by H. Hawk, chairman of the press committee.
- —A committee has been appointed to arrange for a reunion of the Eureka College Alumni during the Kansas City Convention, and we are requested to ask all the alumni of that institution who are intending to be present at the convention to notify W. F. Richardson, chairman of the committee, 1216 Lydia Avenue, Kansas City. This includes the graduates of Ablingdon as well as of Eureka College.
- —The church in Jacksonville, Ill., has raised its apportionment of $100 for Church Extension and in addition took up a collection for the Galveston sufferers. The pastor, Geo. L. Snively, is enjoying the pleasure of preaching to as many people on Sundays as their auditorium will contain, and of frequent additions to the church.
- —The church in Clarinda, Ia., has enjoyed a year of prosperity under the pastoral care of W. B. Clemmer. His annual report, which appears in their local paper, the Christian Witness, is full of encouraging signs of prosperity. There have been seventy additions to the church during the year.
- -B. B. Tyler's address from September 30th up to time of the Kansas City convention will be 2621 Bristol Street, Omaha, where he is to assist W. T. Hilton in a meeting in the Grant Street Christian Church. By the way, we learn that Dr. Tyler has received a call from the South Broadway Church in Denver. It is not known whether he will accept or not. He enjoys the field at large, and the brethren seem to enjoy having him at large where they can catch a little inspiration from him occasionally as he passes by; but he feels that in justice to his wife he should cast anchor with some church, either as temporary supply or as permanent pastor. Here is a rare chance for some good church to reap a harvest from the rich experience of a faithful life.

Catarrh

Is a constitutional disease.

It originates in a scrofulous condition of the blood and depends on that condition. It often causes headache and dizziness, impairs the taste, smell and hearing, affects the vocal organs and disturbs the stomach.

It is always radically and permanent cured by the blood-purifying, alterative and tonic action of

Hood's Sarsaparilia

This great medicine has wrought the most wonderful cures of all diseases depending on scrofula or the scrofulous habit.

Hood's PILLS are the best cathartic.

-Since the personal mention concerning Brother B. B. Tyler was put in print, and just as we close this issue, the sad intelligence comes to us through a letter from Brother Tyler, that his wife had a stroke of paralysis on Saturday morning last. The stroke affects her vocal organs alone at present, but, of course, further develop ments are feared. Bro. Tyler has cancelled all his engagements, and will remain in Chicago until the latter part of October, at which time, if Sister Tyler's health permit, they will go to Denver. He will be obliged to remain away from the Kansas City Convention. "To both of us," he writes, "this is a grievous disappointment." It is disappointment to us all. We are sure the entire brotherhood of Disciples throughout the world will sympathize with Brother Tyler and with his wife in this affliction. For thirty-seven years they have lived and labored together until their lives have become blended into one. the blessing of God rest richly upon them, and, if it be His will, restore our beloved sister to her former health and usefulness.

The Biographical and Historical Library.

On the second page of this issue of the CHRIS TIAN-EVANGELIST will be found repeated our great offer, first published in our last issue, of "A Biographical and Historical Library," containing ten splendid volumes for five dollars. The response to this remarkable offer has been hearty and quick. Quite a number of orders have been received. We take the liberty of quoting the following letter from one of our patrons:

Inclosed please find P. O. order for $5.00 for the "Biographical and Historical Library" advertised in Christian-Evangelist of Sept. 20.

This is a grand offer, which should be accepted by every preacher in the brotherhood May God prosper you in your good work of placing in the hands of our people such high-class literature at so low a price.

J. D. Deming.

It should be remembered that this offer is special one, which will continue in force only until the close of October. The offer is truly sugard one. No preacher can afford to be with out these volumes, whi h give, in the best way, the story of the rise and progress of our reformator movement. Read carefully the advertisement of the second page of this issue and send your orde promptly to the Christian Publishing Company St. Louis, Mo.

—Bro. H. F. McLane, of Toledo, Ohio, expects to resume evangelistic work Nov. 1st, and will have with him Bro. C. E. Millard as evangelistic singer. We have no hesitancy in recommending these brethren to the churches desiring to hold revival meetings. There is ample work to do in this wide field, and we trust they will be kept busy.

.—The stanza of poetry given in the obituary of J. H. Wilson, written by J. Clark Williams, in our issue of the 13th inst., should not have been put in quotation marks. It is original and the writer should not be deprived of his due credit. The quotation marks dropped it unawares somewhere between this office and the press.

—O. D. Maple preached in Scottville, Ill., last Sunday. Church raised $6 for Church Extension being $1 more than apportionment, and their first offering to this work. The Cameron Church on the same day at night gave $7. They will dedicate their new house of worship in November. Bro. Maple will locate at Union for full time, beginning with the month of October.

—Fred Dysart, Solomonville, Arizona, referring to the criticism of Mr. Sheldon by our English correspondent, Mr. Durban, and Dean Haggard's criticism of Prof. Drummond, says:

Can an article so uncomplimentary to the authors of works lik Drummond's Essays and Sheldon's "In HIS Steps" be edifying to any of your readers? Especially in public utterances we should use the greatest care that our words have the approval of the Holy Spirit within us. I believe Bro Haggard has also criticised in a wrong spirit in "The Gladstone-Huxley Controversy." It does seem that the statements that "Mr. Sheldon is an incarnate hyperbole" and that Henry Drummond "has been playing double," are uncharitable and will be stumblingblocks to those we are praying may accept our Savior.

Perhaps our English correspondent wrote with a little more warmth concerning Bro. Sheldou's criticisms than he might have done after mature reflection, but we are sure that he meant no unkindness to Mr. Sheldon, although he used "great plainness of speech." In the case of Prof. Drummond, it is far easier for us to believe that his critic misunderstood his meaning than to believe that one who has contributed so much to the establishment of faith in the minds of educated people would be guilty of "playing double" on a subject in which he was so profoundly interested. Bro. Haggard's motive, however caunst be questioned. Bro. Dysart's word of admonition, we trust, will serve to make us all cautious in our criticisms, especially of those whose writings have been helpful to so many in the religious life.

—The fifth annual roll call of the Church of Christ in Vermont, Ill., was an occasion for rejoicing. The reports were all of a most encouraging nature and printed in full in the Vermont Independent, Sept. 6th.

A CRY FOR HELP.

Galveston and a few neighboring towns are in ruins. A cry of distress has arisen which has awakened sympathy throughout the civilized world. Contributions are pouring in from all quarters, to bury the dead, to feed and clothe the living, and give them something with which to start in life again. And now comes a cry of our own brethren for help to rebuild, or put in repair their houses of worship in Galveston and Alvin. This is an important part of the pressing need. Men cannot live on bread alone. These brethren in the South call for our assistance in this hour of their supreme need. Let us see to it that they do not call in vain. See the communication of the corresponding secretary of the A. C. M. S. elsewhere, and send relief at once to him for these our brethren whom only the direst need could induce to ask for our help. Act promptly. Act quickly.

Iowa County Convention.

The Churches of Christ of Benton County, Iowa, held their forty-second annual meeting at Mt. Auburn, Sept. 7-10, 1900. The six churches were well represented, also soattered Disciples were present. Our five ministers were present and delivered sermons; also Bro. G. C. Johnson, of Wisconsin and N. A. McConnell, of Cedar Rapids, Ia. Bro. Milton Wells is an ideal president. Sorry to lose him. Every church in the county has a C. W. B. M. Auxiliary. Peace and harmony, enthusiasm and fraternity characterized the whole meeting.

THE JOURNEYS OF JESUS

We yet have on hand a number of copies of Stout's "Map of the Journeys of Jesus," which we will sell, while they last, at the greatly reduced price of THREE DOLLARS.

For the next nine months the International Sunday-School Lessons will be on the Life of Christ. These lessons cannot be properly taught without the aid of this map, which shows every spot visited by our Lord during his earthly ministry. Colored lines show his itinerary, and by referring to the chronological chart, which is a part of the map, all of his movements can be easily followed. The map is six feet long and three feet wide. It is finely printed and mounted on cloth, so that it will last for years. It is 'varnished and mounted on rollers, all ready to hang up.

The regular price of this map is FIVE DOLLARS. While our present stock lasts we will sell it for the exceedingly low price of THREE DOLLARS, postpaid. No Sunday-School should be without this indispensable help. 2222666622226666

Mr. and Mrs. J. H. Smart.

On our first page this week will be found a good picture of two faithful servants of Jesus Christ, J. H. Smart, pastor of the church at Winchester, Ill., and his good wife. Bro. Smart was born near Ozark, Mo., in what was then Greene county, but now Christian, in the year 1842. His parents moved to a new part of the county near the present town of Billings when he was a mere boy. There he received his education in the common schools, and when the war broke out he enlisted in the Federal Army and served three years, most of that time as sergeant of his company. At the close of the war he entered Abingdon College and graduated in the year 1868. Soon thereafter he was married to Miss Sadie Garrett, daughter of Peter Garrett, of Camp Point, Ill., who was a graduate of the same school and who has been to him not only a faithful wife but a strong right arm in his ministry. He taught school a few terms in Southwest Missouri after his graduation and then entered the ministry, serving at Holden, Mc., and Macomb, Ill. He was called from the latter place to St. Louis in 1875, where he became editorially associated with the Christian, which later became the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST. He remained with the paper and Christian Publishing Company about ten years, during which time he preached for several churches within reach of St. Louis. Later he became owner and editor of the Faithful Witness at Kansas City, and still later was counected with the Christian Oracle at Chicago. Since severing his relation with that paper he has served the churches at Colfax and Centralia, Ill., respectively, as pastor, and has just entered upon his pastorate at Winchester. He is a quiet, indefatigable worker, a good manager, a faithful pastor and a most acceptable preacher. Every church he has served has prospered under his pastoral care. Smart succeeded Mrs. Goodwin as editor of the Christian Monitor, which she ably conducted many years. They have never had any children of their own, but have reared and educated several. They have never sought conspicuity, and will be about the only persons surprised to see their picture on the first page of the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST.

An Appeal From Galveston,

The following letter from Brother Haston, pastor of the Galveston Church, we lay before our readers for such action as may seem to them to be demanded by the great disaster which has befallen our brethren and sisters in that city:

DEAR BROTHER: - I appeal to the brotherhood through the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST for financial assistance for our brethren and sisters in sore distress in this city. Nearly all are homeless and without clothing or salary. The building is fortunately damaged only about $500. Only two or three have any three have any means of living or can contribute anything to the church for months to come. I lost everything. Plans are being made to rebuild JESSE B. HASTON, Pastor.

At the request of Brother Haston, the CHRIS-TIAN-EVANGELIST will be glad to assist in raising funds for the relief of our brethren in Galveston, and will acknowledge same in its columns. Later, no doubt, a committee will be appointed of the surviving brethren there, who will look over the situation more minutely and will receive and disburse such funds as may be donated and forwarded to them. We need only add that it is meet and proper that we should assist our members there in bearing their burden, and "so fulfill the law of Christ." The editor of this paper was present at the dedication of the church, and is glad to learn that it has only been damaged to the extent named, and not destroyed, as most of the other churches have been. We sympathize deeply with the church there in its losses, and particularly with the surviving members of families who have been bereaved of their loved ones by this great calamity. What is done should be done promptly. All money orders or bank drafts intended for Galveston should be directed and made payable to B. L. Smith, Y. M. C. A. Building, Cincinnati, O.

Our Galveston Brethren.

Jesse B. Haston, missionary of the American Christian Missionary Society and minister of the church at Galveston, writes:

"Five members of the church lost their lives in the storm; several others not yet heard from. Only 40 per cent. of our members will be in Galveston by October 1st; of these only three are in condition enabling them to contribute to the sunport of the church. All the rest are homeless and destitute. The result of the tornado and water is worse than any report can show. I lost everything but my wife and children. I stood to-day on the drift where our home stood and looked three-fourths of a mile to the beach-all is swept clean where there were thickly built residences. It will take $500 to put our church house in repair. We hope our brethren of the country will put us on our feet by donations enough to repair our honse and help our destitute brothren."

I appeal to our brethren everywhere that offerings be taken in behalf of our own brothers and sisters and the church in Galveston. If this work is kept from utter ruin it will be by the help of the brethren outside.

We solicit both personal and church offerings with which to redeem our cause in Galveston and put a song of joy into the hearts of our homeless and destitute brethren. Will you give this your immediate attention?

Some Missouri Convention Personals and Notes.

J. C. Reynolds, returning from a visit to North Dakota, was an interested spectator of the proceedings, and an honored guest. He was at one ime pastor of the Moberly church. Feeble in health, he is robust in faith and joyful in hope.

It was a great pleasure to many to see Frank W. Allen, of Kentucky, once more in a Missouri convention. For many years a resident and a prominent preacher and educator in this state, we seel that he rightfully belongs to Missouri. We cope that some church in the state will lay hands on him and detain him.

C. C. Redgrave, of Maroa, Ill., was another one of our visitors. He had exhibited in a part of the thurch building a number of relics relating to alexander Campbell, and pictures of early scenes connected with our history, which he uses in his illustrated lectures.

We were no less surprised than delighted to see once more in Missouri our genial friend, R. L. Mc-Hatton, for many years a resident of the Pacific Coast. He was a bookkeeper and "general superntendent of the mailing department" of the Christian Pub. Co. when we first came to St. Louis and while he was yet a boy. He will probably visit old friends in Missouri until after the National Convention in Kansas City.

Among the returned prodigals was Bro. Phillips, of Augusta, Ga., who is on a little vacation, and took occasion to visit his old flock in Kansas City, and take in the state convention. He spoke for Church Extension.

Frank G. Tyrell, of Chicago, was another Missourian who returned home to renew his spiritual strength that he may be able to stand against the wiles of—Chicago! He helped the women out in their program, and represented the Christian Century. May he soon be anchored to one of our best churches.

J. B. Briney was, of course, at home in his old field of labor, and he looked and spoke as one capable of doing a great deal yet for the cause he loves. We are glad to learn that his Monthly has succeeded beyond his expectations. May it prosper more and more.

One of the most venerable looking men in the convention, although one of the youngest in spirit, was Dr. W. T. Moore, of Columbia. He has not been as long in Missouri as some of us, but he feels a deep interest in the honor and success of our cause in the state, and he took a lively interest in the proceedings of the convention.

G. F. Assiter, of Troy, who recently returned from a visit to his native England, seemed glad to be back again under the Stars and Stripes, and among his Missouri brethren.

The sisters of Moberly received many compliments for the excellent meals they served the delegates and for the very courteous manner in which it was all done. They deserve to succeed.

It was gallant in Bro. Dutcher and the Mexico church, when the convention was about to be left without an invitation, to step into the breach and offer their hospitality for next year. We hope for this generosity, they may receive a hundred-fold in spiritual blessing.

Would it not make the convention more profitable to the community in which it is held and insure it against the danger of being left out in the cold, if the time were so fixed as to include one Lord's day so that the pulpits could be filled by our preachers, and the whole community brought into touch with the religious spirit of the convention? This would solve the problem of time for the two conventions to carry out their programs without break. We hope the ladies will decide to begin their convention on Friday before the brethren begin theirs, just as they do in the National Convention. If this be tried once, we will never go back to the present arrangement.

Divorce between the C. W. B. M. and the M. C. C. of Missouri? Perish the thought! It must not be. It cannot be. We took each other "for better or for worse," and each year has proved that it has been for the better, and not for the worse. But even if this were not so, then it would be our duty to make it for the better. It is only a question of time for the two programs, and this can be satisfactorily solved by the plan suggested above, or in some other way. No, we will not allow you to leave us, ladies. "United we stand; divided we fall." E pluribus unum; pax vobiscum, et cetera.

PROMISES OF A LARGE GATHERING.

If the reports from our excursion managers in all par s of the land and the number of inquiries for rooms are a fair index of the gathering at our National Convention this year, we are assured now of a convention of such magnitude as will do credit to the movement represented by the Disciples of Christ.

DELEGATIONS ARE BEING WORKED UP

by states, districts and cities. The work of the committee on publicity has not been so much along the line of newspaper articles. The idea of the committee has been rather to organize all over the United States through state and district secretaries and excursion managers in different cities This work has been going on diligently since January first. The chairman of the committee on publicity has been furnished passes by the railroads to go out to the furthest ends of the country and address state conventions and audiences in churches. State secretaries, pastors and excursion managers have been working diligently to insure large delegations by doing personal work. This the committee thought would do more to get a large delegation than to crowd our already overcrowded newspapers with articles urging people to come.

THE CROWD AND THE RESULT.

From this thorough organization we are hearing most encouraging reports, and Kansas City is preparing for five thousand people. We should certainly have that many coming to this metropolis of the West. There is a certain kind of impression which a great gathering makes upon a community. A great crowd with great enthusiasm and great speeches is bound to make a great impression. The impress of this convention will be felt throughout the entire West. It is the purpose of the executive committee to use the newspapers of the West very liberally. But we must have something to talk about. We must have a great crowd of the Lord's people. We must have hosts and we shall set the religious as well as the secular communities to thinking of this great movement which is now shaping so large a part of the thought of the West.

A RINGING SERMON THE FIRST SUNDAY OF OCTOBER.

The committee on publicity urges our preachers to use the first Sunday of October for a wide-awake sermon on all national societies. The last year's reports and your own genius and inspiration for a ringing sermon will come. Show the relation of these boards to each church. Let the people know that this is their work and that representatives should come from each church and hear these reports and the great speeches that will be made. Every church should come into closest co-operative touch with our National Boards. Don't fail to preach the sermon and you will find you have enlisted some one or more who can afford to come and who will come.

EXPENSES LOW.

The entertainment committee expects to get rooms all over the city, in homes of our own brethren for the most part, where lodging will be furnished for 50 cts. a day and lodging and breakfast for 75 cts. to $1, and good meals can be had at restaurants for 15 cts. to 20 cts. The hotels will take about one thousand people and that will be all that will want to go to hotels. Lodgings at homes will be very nice and the street car facilities are such that no one need walk far and a 5 cts. fare, by our complete system of transfers, will take you to the door of the Armory Hall where the principal sessions of the convention are to be held. All communications relative to lodging should be sent to T. S. Ridge, 400 New Ridge Bldg., chairman of the committee on entertainment.

INTEREST DEEPENING.

The most encourraging sign in the growth of our dear church is the deepening interest in our national conventions. The people love the cause we plead and will come out in great numbers to Kaneas City.

We plead and W. Kansas City.

Illinois Jubilee Convention at Bloomington.

This is our opportunity to call attention to the jubilee convention, to held here October 2-4. We renew our invitation to the churches to send large delegations. Come at the beginning and remain to the close, we shall do our best to make you comfortable. The program, printed elsewhere in this paper, is excellent. J. Fred Jones has given full instruction as to railroad rates. On your arrival go at once to the church, corner West and Jefferson Streets, for registration and assignment. On account of the recent fire we have but little if any hotel room, and must lodge our delegates in our homes. If you have not done so, please notify T. M. Clarke of your coming now. A Criticism on Higher Criticism. READY OCT. 15TH.

The cream of three years' hard study is in this book. The strength of mathematical accuracy is reached in the reasoning from science, and the heights of the true and the beautiful are touched in the argument from art. History, psychology, archæology, prophecy, ethics, even religion (not too much), science and art are applied in test of a theory which considers its arguments insuperable and promises to remove theories which render the Bible incapable of intelligent apprehension. If so, no preacher can afford to be ignorant ot these topics. "It is the question," writes B. B. Tyler. The preacher who has no definite idea of the history and present attitude of the issue will be pushed off the earth by a theory which claims a monopoly of scholarship. Every intelligent reader of our papers ought to read this clear-cut volume that he may detect error smuggled in amid a roll of truth. Every believer in the new theory should read that he may know when his audience is smiling at his self-inflicted sophistries. Fifteen chapters, about four hundred pages, sell for $1.75. That is the price for books this size and so elaborate with statistical tables (in the appendix), rendering the proof demonstrative, but we are in it for our health and will mail to advance subscribers for $1.25. Send for descriptive circular. Introduction by W. J. Lhamon.

The Lands of the Long Day-XII.

THE RUSSIAN CHURCH.

The ecclesiastical establishment is so much in evidence all over Russia that even the most careless and casual traveler cannot fail to be much impressed by it. What I have to say of the Russian Church is solely from the point of view of the traveler-somewhat casual, even if not altogether careless. The church is so largely given over to ceremonies that one may form a fair estimate of it by what he sees on the surface. Even its doctrinal controversies tend to take the form of disputes over ceremonies. For example, they do not discuss the question of the Trinity, but whether two or three fingers should be used in making the sign of the cross and whether the "Amen" should be sung twice or thrice at certain places in the service. The whole Eastern Church, both Greek and Russian-and the Russian Church belongs to that general division of the church which is called Greek-can scarcely be said to have any history. Since the separation between Greek and Roman Christianity eight centuries ago, the Greek Church has been virtually dead. It became stagnant while the Roman Church became corrupt. The corruption of Latin Christianity was partially compensated by the Protestant Reformation; but from the lifeless formalism of the Greek Church there has been no revival.

One is first impressed by the fact that the Russian's religion, such as it is, goes with him into all the acts of his lite. It is not a Sunday religion. Any morning in the week you can go into a Russian Church and find a well-attended service in progress there. More than that, you can stroll along a busy street at any hour of the day and see people by the dozen and the hundred halting to bow and cross themselves before the churches and chapels which they pass and before the holy pictures which hang here and there in conspicuous places. At every arch and gateway there is one of these gold-covered pictures, called icons. In the middle of a bridge it is customary to place an icon to which the passers-by show reverence, and in the waiting room of every railway station there is a little corner railed off to serve as a chapel with two or three icons. The lighting of a candle before these pictures is the accepted form of worship, if one cares to go beyond bowing and crossing, and in the railway waiting rooms there is a little stand where one can buy candles for this purpose. It is under the same management usually as the lunch counter.

But to say that the Russians carry their religion into common life is not at all the same as saying that they are habitually honest or moral. In fact, they are not conspicuously so. Your cab driver will religiously doff his hat and cross himself half a dozen times in the course of an ordinary drive, but that does not mean that he will not try to cheat you at the end of it. Christianity in its Russian form is not a religion of morals, but a religion of forms. The forms duly observed, the religious man can engage in any nefarious practice that pleases him, with a calm reliance upon the protecting care of the saint to whom he has paid his devotions. This may not be the theory of the thing, but it is the way it works.

There are a number of cathedrals in St. Petersburg which are very noteworthy as specimens of architecture. Few churches in the world present a more imposing facade than the Cathedral of St. Isaac, with its porticos of monolithic columns of Finnish granite and its perfect dome, but internally it is dark and heavy and its unity is so broken by its vast piers that it is scarcely possible to get an impression of the interior as a whole. The functionaries who show the place to you are dressed, as usual, in a costume which looks far more military than religious. They do not dwell much upon the architectural beauty of the structure or the sanctity of its religious relics, but they are anxious to show you pillars of malachite which cost $60,000 apiece, and pillars of lapis lazuli, more precious than crown jewels. They want to impress upon you the fact that a certain emerald in the diadem of the madonna of a certain picture is worth $300,000; that a certain candlestick contains two hundred and fifty pounds of pure silver; that an icon which they will point out has for a background a solid plate of gold weighing fifty pounds; that the altar railing is of pure silver and weighs half a ton, and similar items of this sort. If one wishes to see precious metals and precious stones, there are few places where he can be more thoroughly gratified than in a Russian church of the first order. Personally, that is not what I want when I am looking at churches; and after going through a dozen or so of the most important in Russia, I came out with a strong feeling that silver was vulgar and gold barbaric, and that nothing was respectable or in good taste but simple poverty, which has neither gold nor silver. I hoped at times that I could catch the zealous sacristan lying about the treasures of his church, but so far as I could discover he always told the truth. It is a fact past all questioning that the quantity of jewels and precious metal that is piled up in the churches of Russia is almost beyond belief.

One morning in St. Petersburg I went up to the daily ten o'clock service at the Kazan Cathedral. a vast building in imitation of St. Peter's at Rome. There are no seats in the church. The floor, like the walls, is of stone. All around the walls of the church are hung icons as close together as they can be placed and others are placed horizontally on stands, convenient to the lips of the devout. There are perhaps three hundred in all. The church is cruciform and a silver railing cuts off that arm of the cross which contains the high altar. The space beyond the railing is divided by a high screen upon which are placed the most sacred of the icons and in the middle of which are a pair of highly ornamental gates. People had been coming and going all morning, buying their candles at a little stand just inside the door, placing them on the candelabra before their chosen icons and kissing once or twice the glass covering of perhaps a dozen or more of the pictures.

Presently a gorgeously robed priest appears in the enclosure behind the silver railing and begins the intonation of a long Scripture reading like a chant in monotone. The people pay but little attention to him at first, but continue independently with their private devotions; but in the course of half an hour, during which he continues to intone without intermission, many have gathered before the railing. Presently there emerge from the other side two priests who take their places before the great gates of the screen. Three singers also appear who, together with the original reader, form a male quartet. The striking thing is that, whereas the reader and the two priests are clad in flowing robes of magnificent brocade and wear hair and beards that have apparently never been trimmed, the three singers are shaven. shorn and dressed according to the fashion of the day and season. But they all stand together-the robe of purple silk by the side of the brown sackcoat and light overcoat.

The service consists for the most part of prayers and responses rendered antiphonally by the priests and the male quartet. There is never any instrumental music in anorthodox Russian church, but there is a great predominance of bass voices in the choir and they can produce organ effects which I never supposed could issue from human throats. The priests both had deep bass voices and the quartet consisted of two bass, one haritone and one tenor. At one stage of the service the gates are swung open revealing the altar beyond. Later they are closed again with much ceremony, and the closing of the gates is supposed to be the point at which the service reaches its climax. Altogether it is musically a very beautiful and impressive service, but tedious as to its length, which is seldom less than two hours. During this time the congregation stands, except as it rests itself by occasionally kneeling. Throughout the entire service, one or two acolytes within the enclosure have been receiving candles, which the faithful pass up over the rail, and placing them on the candlesticks before the most venerated icons. When a candle is burned down about cne-third of its length, it is snuffed out and tossed into a convenient box. The sale of candles at the door is a lucrative business for the church and the sale of these remnants is a convenient perquisite for the priests.

When one remembers that one of the chief points of controversy upon which the Greek and Roman Churches separated was the question of image worship, and that the Eastern Church at that time arrayed itself against the use of images in public worship, it comes as something of a surprise to see the extent to which the use of icons is carried in Russia. In reality there is a far more superstitious dependence upon these in the whole Eastern Church than there is upon crucifixes and images of the saints among Roman Catholics. But the Russians will tell you that they still regard the worship of images as blasphemous and idolatrous. What then constitutes an image? An image, in their definition, is a representation made in the form of some person or thing. A statue or high relief is an image, but a picture or a low relief is not an image.

The ordinary icon consists of a plate of silver, usually gilded, about two feet square, stamped or carved to give a representation of the Virgin and Child or of some saint or group of saints in low relief. But where faces, hands and feet come in the picture, there are openings of the shape of these parts in the metal plate, and these portions are represented in painting inserted behind the metal and showing through these holes. ns are not infrequently ornamented with jewels great value-tiaras of diamonds, ropes of arls, and emeralds as large as pigeon eggs. But painting is usually of the sorriest type. It is point of Russian orthodoxy to maintain the old zantine style of painting. Pre-Raphaelitism may well enough, but the icons perpetuate the le which was in vogue before Cimabue and otto, when ghastliness and cadervousness of body re considered the proper expression of superlae piety. Besides, most of the icons are made factories, not by artists. Any one who goes o a Russian church expecting to find any art rth looking at, is doomed to disappointment. is statement requires perhaps two qualifications, t only two, I think. In the new Cathedral of r Saviour in Moscow there are some admirable dern frescoes and two or three noble altar ces by Neff and Verestschagin; and in all of e older Russian churches, especially in the urches of the Kremlin, and most especially in e Cathedral of the Assumption, there are wall intings of great historical interest and value. nt. in general, ecclesiastical art in Russia has ffered from the same stagnation which vitiates other phases of the national church.

The ancient city of Kief is the Canterbury of ussia. To be sure, Moscow has the church of ghest dignity, but the historic primacy belongs Kief, and the monastery there is the oldest d most revered in the whole empire. Its name Pecherskaya Lavra, but in spite of that fact it s enjoyed a prosperous existence for many cenries. The faithful make pilgrimages hither from I parts of Russia to the number of not less than 50,000 annually. I stopped there a day to see e Russian monk and the Russian pilgrim, and ley are well worth seeing. The monks, like the riests, wear long hair and beards and black robes. he usual hat can best be described as a stovepe with the rim at the top. They are in general a intelligent, pleasant appearing set of men and, hat is more, they are clean. The monks differ com the priests in being unmarried. The Rusan priest is not only permitted but compelled to arry; otherwise he cannot have a parish. The latter is generally arranged for the young priest y his bishop. But the bishop himself cannot ave a wife. When a priest is promoted to a ishopric, if not already a widower, he must either ivorce his wife or persuade her to enter a nun-

The pilgrims at the Lavra were a motley set. few were from the presperous class and had hat thoroughly cosmopolitan air which always haracterizes the more intelligent Russians. The najority were rom the lower walks of life and ad evidently made a desperate struggle to perorm the pilgrimage to Kief. Many had walked a eart or all of the distance from their homes—a erious matter in this country of magnificent disances. Many had begged their way along the coad and, now that they had reached their goal, were continuing their mendicancy, perhaps from force of habit or perhaps as a religious act. The most picturesque element was contributed by the representatives of those semi-barbarous peoples who dwell along the lower Volga and on the Asiatic frontier and in the Caucasus. They wear every style of costume except the common-place European and American suit and their whole appearance is essentially Asiatic, but they do not yield to their more civilized fellow pilgrims in any point of piety. I noticed that some fellows, whom I took to be from the Caucasus district and who looked more like brigands than religious pilgrims, were quite as generous as anybody else in their treatment of the innumerable lame and blind beggars; and there was a group of dark-skinned, tangled-haire and bare-legged women who looked

Many more churches ought to be using this superior book; they need stirring-up to the duty of getting it. Some hesitate on account of the cost; but it is the cheapest book published, all things considered. For the small space left us we print the following benediction, from one of the best musicians among us:

"May the Lord prosper you in the sale of the BEST HYMNAL, ever printed at ANY TIME or PLACE. Faithfully and fraternally, like nomads of the 'desert, who prostrated themselves on the stone floor before an icon several dozen times while I was watching them and were still at it when I left. It struck me, after watching the pilgrims for some time, that it would be a good thing if they would buy fewer candles and

The main church in the monastery was closed for repairs, but the biz circular chapel was crowded with worshipers as thick as they could stand. It was impossible in this dense crowd for the faithful to reach the stands inside of the chapel where the candles were sold, much less to hand them over the altar rail in person to the attendants. But this difficulty was met by passing the money up from hand to hand to the stands, and passing the candles thence from hand to hand to the attendants within the enclosure. Two things impressed me in this connection: The first was that people were not afraid to trust their money under these circumstances in other people's hands; the second was that, however external and formal might be their mode of worship, certainly they did not do it to be seen of men, for after the money had passed through one or two hands no one could tell from whom it came. And even in seeing the people perform their devotions in public before the wayside shrines and on the busy corners of the streets, they never gave me the impression that they were doing it for effect. To be sure, they often did it in a haphazard and hasty fashion, so that their dots and dashes on forehead and breast appeared to be a sort of religious shorthand, with very little of devotional sentiment about it; but the forms of religion are so common and have so fully entered into the daily life of the people that there is no credit to be gained by the punctilious performance of them. They are taken as a matter of course.

And again, while we Occidentals, who are inclined to be rather secretive about our religious observances, have it upon our tongues to blame the demonstrative Oriental for what we term Pharisaism in making a public display of his devotions, it might be well to consider whether it is worse to worship proudly in public in the hope that men may see and praise, or to conceal one's religion in the fear that men may see and laugh. It is a bad thing, of course, to be offensively proud of one's religion, but it is surely not much better to be ashamed of it. But, as I said, it did not strike me that the Russians in performing their accustomed religious rites took any notice of observers, one way or the other.

The monastery at Kief, being a rich institution, undertakes to feed for three days all pilgrims who come. Vast quantities of provisions are handed out to be eaten, picnic fashion, in all the nooks and corners of the huge monastery enclosure, and in addition there is a refectory where several hundred may be seated at tables. I was there at noon and, though I did not impose upon the hospitality of the monks, had an opportunity of seeing what the others had. At each place there was a tin plate and cup, a chunk of rye bread, a knife and fork and a wooden spoon, the latter having a handle in the form of a fish, an early Christian symbol. The repast that day consisted of soup, fish, bread and tea. It was probably better than most of the pilgrims got at home.

The monastery is situated on the cliff which forms one bank of the Dnieper River and, the opposite bank being perfectly flat, commands a view of the valley for many miles. The face of the cliff is honeycombed with passages and chapels cut in the rock, constituting the famous Catacombs of St. Anthony. They are not at all like the Roman catacombs, except in so far as one underground passage must be more or less like another. These are clean, well kept and regular, and the bodies of the seventy saints, which lend sanctity to the place, are shrouded in embroidered silk and lie in handsome open coffins. The monks who conduct you through them, too, are a much more decent set than the Trappist buffoons who exhibit the Catacombs of St. Calixtus on the Appian Way.

COFFEE TOPERS AS BAD AS OTHERS.

"A friend of our family who lived with us a short time was a great coffee drinker and a continual sufferer with dyspensia. He admitted that coffee disagreed with him; but you know how the coffee drinker will hold onto his coffee, even if he knows it causes dyspepsia.

"One day he said to me that Postum Food Coffee had been recommended and suggested that he would like very much to try it. I secured a package and made it strictly according to directions. He was delighted with the new beverage, as was every one of our family. He became very fond of it and in a short time his dyspepsia disappeared. He continued using the Postum and in about three months gained twelve pounds.

"My husband is a practicing physician and regards Postum as the healthiest of all beverages. He never drinks coffee, but is very fond of Postum. In fact all of our family are, and we never think of drinking coffee any more." Mrs. Mary E. Brown, Waterford, Va.

New York Letter.

In the important work of city missions, or city Church Extension as some prefer to call the work, the Lay Helpers' Association, of New York, may teach some valuable lessons. This is part of the local Brotherhood of Saint Andrew, which has for its special work the planting and fostering of new missions within the city of New York. The organization consists of "laymen" who serve without salaries. They go into a new and growing section of the city and plant a Sunday-school and speak or read the Episcopal liturgy. Within a few years they have planted a half dozen growing missions in Bronx Borough, which within a short time will become churches. Are there not in most of our cities a goodly number of strong, zealous business men who could be formed into a local missionary organization whose special object shall be the Church Extension, by means of Sunday-schools and teaching and preaching? The preachers cannot do all this sort of work needed. I am aware there are some such movements going on now under our city churches, but may we no thave many aggressive organizations for city evangelization through Sunday-school work?

Another method that has been found helpful in many ways is the quiet formation of a prayer and evangelistic league between the minister and those of his people who desire to be useful in the work of salvation. The preacher can go to a certain member whom he knows to be intelligent, faithful and anxious to work for the Master and suggest that he take the matter of leading Mf. A into the kingdom, and that if agreeable they will form between themselves an alliance of prayer and labor for the conversion to Christ of Mr. A. The minister may form many such alliances with his people individually and thus have scores of earnest workers co-operating with him all the time with this specific object in view. Besides being in itself the greatest mission church in the world, such work will enormously enrich the faith and joy of those engaged in it; it will also strengthen the bonds of union between the preacher and the people; moreover, such practical, definite efforts will afford the most valuable topics for conference and prayer in pastoral visitation. The more the people can be led individually into such endeavors the more will the cause of Christ prosper. We should be on the alert to find some means by which every member in the church may become useful in the work of saving men.

The last quarterly meeting of the New York district of the C. W. B. M. was held with the Second Church (Greenpoint,) Brooklyn, Tuesday afternoon and evening, September 11. Though the weather was excessively warm the attendance and interest were good. The Greenpeint people entertained the meeting right royally, both on the program and at the table. Many expressed their pleasure at the heartiness of the song service rendered by the people of that church. They sing with the spirit and the understanding also. This was the first time they have entertained the district meeting, but we feel sure it will not be the last. Their auxiliary is young as yet, having organized only a few months ago. The preachers of the city were present and rendered all the assistance in their power. They all report their work as starting off well this autumn, with a bright outlook.

The time being near at hand for the Kansas City Convention, many are planning to go up with the tribes to this meeting of the Lord's hosts. People are asking "which route will you go? and you?" Those of us from New York, Baltimore, Washington and many other points in the East will go, it is hoped, over the Baltimore & Ohio to St. Louis and thence over the Missouri Pacific. Their rates will be as low as the lowest (even lower than some, being a differential line); their time will be as fast as any and they promise that their service will be all that can be desired. I have been asked to take charge of the Eastern delegation and see that they all be good and keep sweet! After consultation with several good men it has been thought best to go over the route mentioned above, and that we all plan that we may go and return together-one, if not both. May I ask. therefore, when you, Eastern reader, prefer to start? The best train leaves New York (Liberty St.) at 10 A. M.; Philadelphia, 12:20 P. M.; Baltimore, 2:26; Washington, 3:45. Leaving New York one morning we will be in Kansas City the second morning for breakfast. Will all the Eastern delegates drop me a card saying what day they prefer to start, so we may arrange to go together? The fare for the round trip is one single fare and a third. It is to be hoped that our churches of the East will be well represented in this convention, for it will be an inspiration in all their work of the year. Besides, the social fellowship of the national conventions are always most delightful. Let us be in Kansas City October 12-18, whither the tribes of the Lord go up.

I am reading with much interest and entertainment that charming little book of travel, "Wheeling Through Europe," by W. E. Garrison. The book is well written, and unlike many travel sketches it is refreshing all the while. Many times its cute turns compel the reader to smile as he imagines he can almost see the funny things the author depicts. The next best thing to a trip through Europe a-wheel is, one imagines, the trip a-book, some quiet evening, with Winfred Ernest Garrison as guide and instructor. This, his first book, is as interesting, though wholly different, as his first sermon, which was delivered in my pulpit in New York, some six years ago. Since that time our friendship has been cordial, and now this delightful booklet seems to increase and strengthen those bonds "Wheeling Through Europe" will, if you read it, entertain and teach you.

The Creed of No Creed.

I have just read with great delight and pro Joseph Fort Newton's article in the Christian-EvangeList of Sept. 6 on the subject of "The Underlying Unity of Spirit."

He is very near to a great truth we all should know. His main contention of the unity of the spirit in faith, peace, holiness and love will become more and more generally recognized as the real essence of the Church of Christ.

But I must dissent from his manner or reasoning about this truth. Why should be denounce creeds when he sets forth his own creed? Why decry intellection in religion and then make use of his own views (intellections) before the minds of other people?

Into this self-contradiction do all these "nocreed" people fall.

"The intellect," he says, "is divisive."

No. Imperfection of knowledge is divisive.

Are people divided as to whether two and two make four?

They are one in their intellections on this truth because their knowledge is perfect. They are divided on the subject of evolution because their knowledge of facts in the case is not perfect.

Love may be as divisive as intellect. To love our own and to be jealous of others for the sake of those we love is as common as life. But it is divisive.

If a man have no creed he is an agnostic. He refuses to formulate his thoughts because he believes that either the facts are not there to be known or his knowledge of them is too imperfe to be stated.

This is really the case with our brother at thousands more like him. Certain dogmas which have been held as infallible truths they have come to doubt. Certain truths in the religion life and consciousness they see and know, hence they denounce the old creeds which they have lost faith in and contend for the living truth which they do have faith in, but their settin forth of these truths is just as much of an act of the intellect and will just as surely divide betwee them and those who do not see these truths a they do as the discarded dogmas which divide the fathers.

Advanced religion is not a matter of no creed but of more perfect knowledge of the truth.

Much of the religious theorizing of the pas did not affect the life and relations of man to make them better.

The tendency is to drop these theories an employ the means which make human lives purer sweeter and more helpful.

To set forth this change so that men may know of it and lay hold upon this better concept of religion will require just as much intellectual work as did the production of the old dogmas. There will be less speculation about it and more of actual fact; that is the chief difference.

And when this new and better truth is fully set forth and believed and acted upon, it will be a creed and a good one, too, whether it is mechanically arranged as Arts I. II. III., or not, as i likely will not be.

Minister's Food

ITS VALUE DISCOVERED DURING ABSENCE OF FAM. ILY.

Rev. J. B. Ley, pastor of the First M. E. Church South Tampa, Fla., had an interesting experience when his family were compelled to leave on account of the yellow fever. He says: "Last September, when we were visited by a yellow fever scare, my family left for an indefinite stay in the interior.

"I had, for about two years, been under considerable physical and mental strain, and my nervous system seemed to utterly give way. I hasome excellent physicians, but their remediagencies failed to reach the case.—at best affording only temporary relief.

"At the time the family left, my attention was called to Grape-Nuts food. Several things halled me to believe that my troubles were largely due to improper nutrition. The absence of the family gave me a good opportunity to try the new food, for it is perfectly cooked and therefore required no work on my part.

"So I began to make two meals a day, supper and breakfast, on Grape Nuts and cream or milk and had nothing else. I confined myself to the proper allowance, not overeating. The improvement was marked, almost from the first,—my digestion was better, sleep became regular and resiful, and I began to gain flesh. I could soon divork with less fatigue and more satisfaction.

"My nervous system has been wonderfully im proved, and today I weigh more than I have eve weighed, and find myself equal to all the respon sibility. This is not all; on the return of the fan ily Grape-Nuts became a regular article of foo at the morning hour. The children ate it and im proved.

"My wife who was nursing an infant, discovere that after she began using Grape-Nuts regularly for the first time in many years, Nature's foot supply for the baby was adequate, without resort itg to artificial subterfuges. Grape-Nuts foot not only carried us through the sickly season, bu has been a Godsend to our whole family."

B. B. Tyler's Letter.

In my letter of last week I spoke of the Lanoni Chronicle when I should have said Herald. the paper was named in connection with Mr. rederick M. Smith, who is the associate editor. 'his Smith deserves mention in this correspondnce only, or chiefly, because he is the son of oseph Smith, Jr., who is the president of the Reorgan.zed Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints," and this Joseph Smith is a son of the uthor of the Book of Mormon, who was killed by mob at Carthage, Ill, in 1844.

The Book of Mormon was printed, originally, in almyra, New York, in 1830. The printer was E. B. Grandin, and on the title-page it was claimed o have been "printed for the author." On the ame page, in small capitals, are the words:

> "BY JOSEPH SMITH, JUNIOR, AUTHOR AND PROPRIETOR.'

I believe that the title-page of the original dition of the Book of Mormon, the portion of it ere quoted, tells the truth. Joseph Smith, who vas killed at Carthage, Ill., was the author of this ingular book. He may have been assisted in the vork, but to him belonged the real authorship. he money made out of its publication belonged o him. He was smart enough to secure from the overnment of the United States a copyright of he book and thus make sure, for a number of ears, of the profits resulting from its sale. The ertificate of the clerk of the court issuing the onvright reads as follows:

"Be it remembered, that on the eleventh day of une, in the fifty-third year of the Independence f the United States of America, A. D., 1829, oseph Smith, Jun, of the Said District, hath deosited in this office the title of a Book, the right ohereof he claims as author," etc.

This is copied from a "History of the Church of esus Christ of Latter Day Saints," . . "written and compiled by President Joseph Smith and Aposle Herman C. Smith of the Reorganized Church." This is therefore by authority. The book reerred to is the work now called "The Book of formon." The first edition did not bear this title. he name of the book at first was "The Nephite Records." The claim was put forth that it was written by the hand of Mormon upon plates

aken from the plates of Nephi." The first edition of the book was five thousand opies. The cost of publication was three thousand dollars. Martin Harris advanced the money. some years afterward Mr. Harris was asked if he ost money in the venture and he replied: "I never ost a cent. Mr. Smith paid me all I advanced and nore too." Then follow these words in the 'History of the Church" above quoted: "As much is to say he received a portion of the profits acruing from the sale of the books." There was money, then, in this scheme for the principals from the beginning. The authors of the "History" nake this statement to show how honest "Joseph he Martyr" was. I use the words to show that Mormonism was profitable in dollars and cents to he principals from the beginning. Is not this egitimate? President Joseph Smith and Apostle Herman G. Smith speak of the "profits accruing

A few days ago in the "Saints' Home" in Lamoni, Iowa, I was shown a picture of the Nauvoo Temple and was told by a "Saint" that the cost of the building was one million dollars. Joseph Smith, the "author," etc., controlled everything belonging to the "Saints" in those days. If the meeting house of the Mormons in Nauvoo, Ill., cost a million dollars do you think the head of the institution suffered the pangs of poverty?

rom the sale of the books." There were profits hen!

Speaking of Nauvoo and of the authority of Joseph Smith reminds me of an interesting ordinance passed by the Nauvoo City Council. The said ordinance reads as follows:

"An ordinance for the health and convenience of Travellers and other persons.

"Sec. 1. Be it ordained by the City Council of Nauvoo, That the Mayor of the city be and is hereby authorized to sell or give spirits of any quantity as he in his wisdom shall judge to be for the health, comfort or convenience of such travellers, or other persons as shall visit his house from time to time. JOSEPH SMITH, Mayor.

"Passed Dec. 12, 1842.

"W. RICHARDS, Recorder."

This was when Joseph was in the zenith of his power! Comment is unnecessary. Let the unadorned fact speak.

There are already ten Mormon sects. The Lamoni Mormons claim to constitute the true church of Jesus Christ. S milar claims, I doubt not, are put in by the nine other kinds of "Saints." Each section claims to be the true church. In Joseph's account of himself he says that when he was in his youth moved upon to begin a religious life he could not enter into the fellowship of any existing denomination on account of their sectarianism!

The Josephite Mormons are anti-polygamists. The present President Joseph Smith has written a pamphlet on the subject of polygamy in which he labors to show that plural marriages began, not with his fatner, but with Brigham Young. The Book of Mormon can, no doubt, be quoted against polygamy. Even our Bible has been changed so as to condemn polygamy in no uncertain language. I hold, however, at this moment, a letter written by a gentleman of unquestioned veracity, and who has investigated Mormonism thoroughly, in which he says:

"I have copies of a number of affidavits from women who swore they were sealed to Joseph. He was the biggest libertine I ever heard of. You may refer to them and if a Mormon challenges your statement that Smith was muchly married the proof will be forthcoming."

David Whitmer, one of the "three witnesses" to the Book of Mormon, said:

"I have as much evidence to believe that Joseph received the revelation on polygamy and gave it to the church as I have to believe that such a man as George Washington ever lived. I never saw General Washington, but from reliable testimony I believe that he did live."

I have heard that R. B. Neal has a letter from the elder who copied the revelation on polygamy at the request of Joseph Smith-copied it as a matter of divine revelation. If you are interested in this matter write to R. B. Neal, Grayson, Ky.

My visit to Lamoni was a day long to be remembered. I visited the printing house, the church and the "Saints' Home."

The "Saints' Home" is a home for aged men and women and is one of the best places of the kind that I ever saw. Connected with it is a farm of good Iowa land of a hundred and seventyfive acres. The "Home" is full of "Saints;" cottages in connection with the "Home" will soon be erected to shelter those who are in need of the care of their brethren.

The publishing house was a disappointment to me. It was neither so large nor so well appointed as I expected. I bought some books, of course, and have been reading them. This will explain the character of this letter. I have been recommending Neal's tracts to those who find it necessary to combat Mormonism; but the "History" from which I have quoted is worth more to the man who wants to fight the "Latter Day Saints" than anything that Neal or any other non-Mormon can write. The work complete costs six dollars. This is the chief objection to it. R. B. Neal's tracts cost five cents each, or even less when taken in quantities. I confess that I had no idea of the baseness of Mormonism until this "History" came into my hands.

The house of worship in Lamoni is a plain, substantial brick structure with an audience room that will accommodate 700 persons. Practically there is no other church in Lamoni than that of the "Saints."

They, the rank and file, are ignorant, honest people. When I was in the "Home" I told some of the inmates that I had visited the publishing house and had purchased some of their literature, with which they were evidently pleased. One old man said: "And so you are not afraid to read our literature? You will come out all right." I will not soon forget a sweet-faced old "Saint" of the female persuasion whose confidence in my conversion was expressed in the most emphatic terms when I informed her of my literary purchases. "Ah," said she, "you will be a Saint yet." I confess that their simple, downright honesty quite captivated me.

Los Angeles Letter.

A committe of brethren from California will attend the Kansas City Convention with a view of getting the convention of 1901 or 1902 held in this state. There are many reasons why the Pacific Coast brethren think this would be wise. It would be a great education for many in our brotherhood if they could make a trip to the Pacific Coast. They would realize as never before the size of our great country. They would learn something of the importance of doing mission work in the great state of California. At present only about $1,000 is being expended annually by our national boards for missionary work in the Golden State. A trip to this great country would impress upon the hearts of our brethren as nothing else could the need for such an investment of money. The United States is rapidly facing westward, following our newly acquired possessions, thus making the Pacific Coast a most important part of this mighty nation This part of the country ought, therefore, to be rapidly evangelized. Again, such a convention would make a profound impression for good and in behalf of our great plea. Many persons here do not realize what a tremendous religious force the Disciples of Christ are. Our great convention would help us to emphasize that great fact. Furthermore, it would afford many of our church people an opportunity to visit the Pacific Coast at convention rates. The large attendance upon the Christian Endeavor Convention, held in San Francisco three years ago, and the National Educational Association, held in Los Angeles two years since, was a demonstration that many Eastern people are only awaiting an excuse or opportunity to come to California. To combine the pleasure of such a trip with the profit of a convention would be an attraction many could not resist, and I have no doubt such a convention would be largely attended. Watch out for the California committee at Kansas City.

The two California conventions for this year were most successful. At both the attendance was large and the interest fine. The churches in the central and northern portions of the state hold their annual gatherings at Santa Cruz, where they own a fine tabernacle and grounds. That convention divided that part of the state into four districts and are expecting to support an evangelist in each district. These evangelists are to be a kind of superintendent of the work in each of their districts. This is believed by that convention to be the wisest expenditure of money. The churches in Southern California held their summer assembly at Long Beach, where we rent a tabernacle. Our convention in Southern California expends its missionary funds in aiding the weaker churches to support pastors. It will aid at least eight such churches this year with perhaps a Sunday-school evangelist for part of the year. We have organizations already in almost every town where one is needed. Two or three more preachers at salaries of about six hundred dollars could be used in this section. Our churches want men who can command elsewhere about twelve hundred dollars to work for about half that price, taking the other half in climate. To many preachers having sick families this proves quite an inducement. The cause in California is most encouraging.

On Lord's day, September 9, 1900, I entered upon the eleventh year of my pastorate in Los Angeles. The tenth year's work was the best of them all. In this instance the best is last. The church is very active in missionary enterprise. During the year of 1900 our church will raise $1,200 for missionary work. Few churches will make a better record. We enter upon another year's work, praying the great Head of the Church to honor his word and bless his work to the salvation of many souls. A. C. SMITHER.

From Hillsbury to Halifax.

Montreal, the largest city in the Dominion, has a population of 350,000. Where it is situated a trading post was established by the French 250 years ago; and this was the last place yielded by the French to the English in 1760. For many years it was the center of the fur trade. It is not only a fine railway center, but numerous At lantic at amers run between it and foreign ports. I am told that it is so intensely Roman Catholic that the Protestant population numbers only 3,500. It was in Montreal that the baser sort of French Catholics undertook to break up the Christian Endeavor Convention when it was held there in

In 1893 it was said that there wes only one family belonging to the Christian Church living in Montreal. I am informed that there are upwards of twenty members living there now. I remained in the city only four hours, and not having the address of any of the members I was unable to call upon them. Having been in Montreal before, I did not wish to tarry there. So, taking a train I pushed on to the oldest and in some respects, the most wonderful city in North America -Quebec. No one who visits Canada can afford to not spend some time in quaint old Quebec. Here one feels that he has suddenly stepped out of New-World civilization into that of the Old

I had read and heard much about Quebec, and like many others, had it pictured in my mind as an old, dilapidated place, partly in ruins. But when I came to see it I found the very reverse to be true. Notwithstanding its age and irregularity, it is one of the neatest, cleanest and best kept cities I have ever visited. It has a popula tion of nearly 75,000. It occupies the base and summit of a lofty crag projecting into the St. Lawrence. Its fortifications are doubtless the strongest on the continent, and are said to be second only to those of Gibraltar. There are strong forts on both sides of the river, which is narrower here than at any other point in its en-

Jacques Cartier, the first European who sailed into this river, spent the winter of 1535 at the base of the cliffs upon which Quebec stands, and French fur companies soon after here established a headquarters for trading. As the settlement grew and the fortifications were enlarged Quebec became the stronghold of Canada, remaining so until its capture by Wolfe in 1759.

So charmed was I with this peculiar city, uniting so wonderfully as it does in its make-up the distant past and the present, that I spent three days studying the various things that are of peculiar interest to one in search of knowledge. No other city in America is so grandly situated or offers views from its higher points so diversified or lovely. There seems to be a kind of enchantment in the very atmosphere of this quaint city, so unlike any other city to be found in North

From these high cliffs upon which the city stands and from under these gray old walls went forth the pioneers of what is now the granary of the world into the unknown wilderness. From this antique city, also, departed the first Catholic missionaries, carrying the Christian religion as they teach it to distant tribes and peoples. But that which must forever give Quebec chief claim to the attention of the traveler is its historic battlefield, which has seen the fiercest and most momentous battle in the early history of North America, and on which both France and England's generals perished in the final struggle for the possession of Canada. It is impossible to stand here and reflect upon the momentous consequences of Wolfe's victory upon the plains of Abraham

Roger Williams and Religious Liberty-I.

The writer purposes a few not lengthy articles n the above theme. They are called out by a aragraph concerning Roger Williams in B. B. yler's letter of July 26. (Being absent on my acation, several weeks elapsed before I saw it.) Bro. Tyler is always racy and readable and very early always right. But he is wrong in this inance, even though he may have given the view f this great historical character as held by many f his contemporaries and substantially endorsed y some writers on the threshold of the 20th cen-

Cotton Mather regarded Roger Williams as a an with a windmill in his head. But many peole have looked upon Cotton Mather as a man vith several good sized windmills in his head. Vevertheless, so dispassionate and philosophical a nan as Benjamin Franklin expressed profound reard for Cotton Mather.

Indeed, windmills in the head as well as above he head seem to have been an agency in promotng civilization.

Henry M. Dexter, of our day, one time editor of he Congregationalist, and an authority on the Pilgrims and Puritans, writes of Roger Williams as man of tangents -a nuisance, who thought himelf able to improve on everything in the civil and eligious world. Therefore, I can easily make allowance for Bro. Tyler's mistake. Nevertheless, ne is mistaken, though by no means so seriously as to impair his splendid name for ability, inegrity, fidelity and generosity as a journalist.

It would not be so easy to deny that Roger Williams was sometimes erratic, as reformers are apt to be; just how erratic I cannot say. But I am certain that he cannot truthfully be written up or rather written down as a man of seditious, insubordinate and self seeking spirit. He was a man of one idea, but that idea was too all-inclusive to develop a mere crank, or a bigot, or fanatic out of the man possessed with a passion for religious liberty. He counted worldly happiness and honor as nothing; yea, he took his very life in his hand, ready to surrender it at any time for its maintenance of religious liberty in the best and broadest sense of that word.

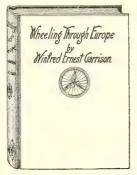

Such a man as he could not go back to England and "live in comfort," though the government provided him safe passage and free of all charge.

Emerson has said: "'Tis man's perdition to be safe when for the truth he ought to die." One cannot afford to give up duty or his mission from God for any life he can live in this world. A poor world indeed at such a cost. "A great man has great faults," in many instances at least.

I have seen men in whom there was little fault and little of anything else. A rock, great in appearance as seen by itself does not mar the symmetry of the mountain on whose slope it rests. As the mountain is viewed from the distance, indeed, the rock on its slope will not be seen at all. But we may nestle so close to the rock as that it obscures the mountain. We should not, however, linger so close to a great man's faults as to suffer them to obscure his symmetrical manhood, which may be immeasurably greater than those faults, great as they may appear when viewed in isolation from that majestic manhood. Prejudice may manufacture a glass that magnifies faults and minimizes virtues, majestically built, as they may be, into a splendid character.

Bancroft, the historian, says of Roger Williams: "He is the first Christian legislator who provided for perfect religious liberty in any state. Like the cross of Christ, the crime of Roger Williams is now the glory of the republic." Still further, Bancroft has declared that for his service in moral science Roger Williams deserves a name as illustrious among the benefactors of mankind as that accorded to Copernicus, Kepler and Newton for their achievements in the realm of physical science. "It is wonderful," says Bancroft, "with what distinctness Roger Williams deduced his inferences; the readiness with which he accepted every fair inference from his doctrines and the circumspection with which he repelled every unjust imputation."

Now, this letter is simply preliminary. If there shall be any controversy between myself and Bro. Tyler on this theme our warm personal friendship is the guarantee that it will be conducted in the kindliest spirit; in terms of respect and in the interest of that truth our common love for which binds us in close and precious fellowship.

As I write I shall be kept from any intentional injustice by the memory of his kind words spoken to me and of me, publicly and privately, concerning my own sporadic efforts in journalism, always doing me more than full justice. Indeed, it is at his kindly suggestion that I am again writing for the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST-though I had not thought my first article would be on this theme, with Bro. Tyler's personality so prominent.

But I must thank him sincerely for his instrumentality in leading me out into a study so fascinating and so entirely congenial. If any pleasure or profit shall come from my articles, to B. B. Tyler belongs all the credit. He does double and triple work in writing himself and in stimulating the pens of other writers. The good Spirit will, I know, guide us both. W. H. ROGERS. Alvin, Texas, Calls for Help.

ALVIN, Texas, Sept. 22, 1900.

DEAR BRETHREN IN CHRIST:-We come to you asking aid to rebuild our church house which was swept away by the fearful coast storm on the 8th of September. Our little town of 2,000 souls was left almost houseless and helpless. Such a calamity has not befallen any people in the past century. No less than 10,000 people swept into eternity at one fearful swoop of the storm's fury. The gen-The generous public are supplying the destitute with food and raiment, and some means to rebuild their homes. But we must look to our brethren for aid to rebuild our house of worship. Alvin is one of the most important places on the coast outside of Houston and Galveston. Will you not then lay the need of this enterprise before your people and take an offering for the rebuilding of the Alvin church? Send all amounts to J. M. Keeton, treasurer building committee, Alvin, Texas. Now do not pass this lightly by, but act promptly and liberally, please. Other churches are sending in help to rebuild their houses and we must not be behind in getting our work organized and moving forward. Help us now and we will help others in return.

Your brethren in the one faith and hope,

W. J. HAYWOOD, J. M. KEETON, G. W. DURANT, MRS. GIBSON, MR. WILBURN

We heartily endorse the above and recommend prompt action upon the part of all.

Idaho Convention.

Arrangements are now being made for a convention of the Disciples of Christ in the state of Idaho. The time selected is October 2-4, and the place is Payette. The program is now nearly ready for publication. We hope to have a larger gathering of the brethren than has ever been held in the state up to this time. Bro. Wm. F. Cowden will be present at this meeting and will deliver at least two addresses.

The brethren of Eastern Oregon will have a good opportunity to attend a meeting that will prove as helpful to them as if they lived in the state, and it is earnestly hoped that they will avail themselves of this opportunity to get acquainted with their brethren in this part of the country. The church at Payette extends a cordial invitation to all Disciples to come and partake of their hospitality during this convention. Send your name to Eld. G. L. Surber, Payette, and your home will be assigned to you. Do this at once.

The Value Of Charcoal.

Few People Know How Useful is in Preserving Health and Beauty.

Nearly everybody knows that charcoal is the safest and most efficient disinfectant and purifier nature, but few realize its value when taken in the human system for the same cleansing purpose

Charcoal is a remedy that the more you take of the better, it is not a drug at all, but simply absorb the gases and impurities always present in the stom ach and intestines and carries them out of the sys tem.

Charcoal sweetens the breath after smoking drinking or after eating onions and odorous vegeta

Charcoal effectually clears and improves the com plexion, it whitens the teeth and further acts as natural and eminently safe cathartic

It absorbs the injurious gases which collect in the stomach and bowels; it disinfects the mouth and taroat from the poison of catarrh.

All druggists sell charcoal in one form or another but probably the best charcoal and the most for the money is in Stuart's Absorbent Lozenges; they are com posed of the finest powdered Willow charcoa and other harmless antiseptics in tablet form of rather in the form of large, pleasant tasting lozenges, the charcoal being mixed with honey.

ges, the charcoal being mixed with honey.

The daily use of thes a lozenges will soon tell in a much improved condition of the general health better complexion, sweeter breath and purer blood and the beauty of it is, that no possible harm can result from their continued use, but on the contrary great henefit. great benefit great benefit.

A Buffalo physician in speaking of the benefits of charcoal, says: "I advise Stuart's Absorbent Lozenges to all patients suffering from gas in the stomach and bowels, and to clear the c mplexion and purify the breath, mouth and throat; I also believe the liver is greatly benefited by the daily use of them; they cost but twenty-five cents a box at drug stores, and although in some sense a patent preparation yet I believe I get more and better charcoal in Stuart's Absorbent Lozenges than in any of the ordidary charcoal tablets."

THE FEAR OF HUMBUG

Prevents Many People From Trying a Good Medicine.

Stomach troubles are so common and in most cases so obstinate to cure that people are apt to look with suspicion on any remedy claiming to be a radical, permanent cure for dyspepsia and indigestion. Many such pride themselves on their acuteness in never being humbugged, especially in medi-

This fear of being humbugged can be carried too far, so far in fact, that many people suffer for years with weak digestion rather than risk a little time and money in faithfully testing the claims made of a preparation so reliable and universally used as Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets.

Now Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets are vastly different in one important respect from ordinary proprietary medicines for the reason that they are not a secret patent medicine, no secret is made of their ingredients, but analysis shows them to contain the natural digestive ferments, pure aseptic pepsin, the digestive acids, Golden Seal, bismuth, hydrastis and They are not cathartic, neither do they act powerfully on any organ, but they cure indigestion on the common-sense plan of digesting the food eaten thoroughly before it has time to ferment, sour and cause the mischief. This is the only secret of their success

Cathartic pills never have and never can cure indigestion and stomach troubles because they act entirely on the bowels, whereas the whole trouble entirely on the bowels, whereas the whole trouble is really in the stomach.

Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets taken after meals digest the food. That is all there is to it. Food not digested or half digested is poison as it creates gas, acidity, headaches, palpitation of the heart, loss of flesh and appetite and many other troubles which are often called by some other name.

They are sold by drugglists everywhere at 50 cents per package. Address F. A. Stuart Co., Marshall, Mich., for little book on stomach diseases, sent free.

The Mutations of Time.

GEO. W. ARCHER.

How soon the scenes about us change We knew so well!

Just why the field and woods look strange, Twere hard to tell.

For memory holds the pictures dear She made in youth; Yet, when we see how things appear,

We doubt their truth.

Yon mountain's peak we ofttimes saw, In days gone by,

And which inspired our hearts with awe, Seems not so high!

The noisy stream, the babbling brook, We scarce recall,

For when compared with memory's book They seem too small!

The river, too, whose waters deep, In silence glide,

Is far less grand, the banks less steep On either side!

But fancy doubtless helped create Each sketch we prize;

The change, perhaps, is not so great, As with our eyes.

For Time's deft fingers touch so light, We feel no harm:

He thus impairs our sense of sight Without alarm:

But not a single touch is lost,

Though gently made, And we, like flowers exposed to frost, Begin to fade.

Now life is fraught with ease to few, We must confess.

And oft we see the brave and true In sore distress.

The form once strong is stooped and bent By fell disease;

Thus, Fate unfolds her dire intent By slow degrees.

The flashing eye must lose its fire, And call for aid:

The flush of beauty we admire Must likewise fade.

The maiden's face so wondrous fair Inspires delight;

But Time will touch her golden hair And tarn it white.

The bounding steps of lusty youth Will need support

As time asserts the solemn truth That life is short.

The voice that makes our heart-strings thrill

Will grate and squeak, And then, alas! 'twill soon be still, No more to speak!

The strides of mind, the power of thought

And earthly lore, All, all of these must count for naught And nothing more.

True, thoughts may live to bless the world For many a day;

But matter is to ruin hurled And sure decay.

'Twere but for us each change to note

That we behold, And learn that as we downward float We're growing old.

The wise prepare as best they may-And well they ought—
But fools let life all slip away
Without a thought!

Time rushes by with silent speed;

Some laugh, some weep; While all may see his footsteps lead Where mortals sleep!

The signboards point where millions lie That earth once knew;

And so, my friend, must you and I-We're going on!

Baldwyn, Miss.

"I Am a Christian."

MRS. EFFIE DAUPHIN.

"Or, at least, just as good as some of those that profess to be Christians. I do not kill, steal or do any of those things that are against the law, and I live just as good moral lives as they do."

Yes but, my brother, the word Christian means "a believer in the religion of Christ" and not "perfection," as some people persist in defining it, while disciple, a word that I like and wish that it were more commonly used, we find means "a learner" only, a humble, sincere "learner," not professing perfection, but trying to follow the one perfect example.

If you would only look to Christ for your example instead of looking to church members, how differently the Christian life would look to you. They may have tendencies and temptations in different ways unknown to you, so different are we constituted, can you not be charitable enough to give them credit for their struggle for the right?

And then, dear brother, do you realize how short this life must be at its best, and how long eternity is? Jesus has said: "Whosover shall deny me before men, him will I also deny before my Father which is heaven" (Mat. 10:33).

Are you not denying him?

There are only two masters; you are either serving God or Mammon; if you are not on the Lord's side, you are against him. And can you afford to be against him? It seems to me if I did not feel that my name was written in the "Lamb's book of life" I could not run fast enough to get to some church, the ark of safety, to plead to be taken in. I should not wait for them to write for me, for it is Christ's church and all are welcome. Never mind if there are many Judases there: do not take them, but Christ, for your guide and they cannot harm you.

You say that Christians' prayers are not always answered; of course they are not always answered just in our way. Neither do we grant the requests of our children, because they ask amiss-they sometimes ask for things that we know would not be for their good. But he will answer the prayers of his children in his own time and way, and always for their best good. And God is everywhere present. Do you not fear to be in his presence and against him? I once heard a story of a little girl who had been very naughty, and her mamma told her that God was everywhere and saw everything that she did. "Is he in this room?" she asked. "Yes." "Is he in my playhouse?"

"Yes." "Is he out of doors?" "Yes." Wit a troubled look she turned and walked fro the room, her little pet dog following he Suddenly she turned and crossly said to th dog:

"Go back; it's bad enough to have Go tagging me all the time, without you!"

Ah, the presence of the kind, loving Fatl er worry those that are against him. Yo say that you do pray to him and hope to h saved sometime. Then why not come on boldly and confess him, for he has said "Whosover therefore shall confess me before men, him will I confess also before my Fatl er which is in heav n' (Matt. 10:32). Coul you be a good Woodman or Odd Fellow an not join their lodge? You laugh at such a idea and still you are trying to be a Chri tian on the sly, so that you may squeeze int heaven at the last moment on that. Tak care that the evil one does not persuade yo into believing that you may until it is to late. Then, dear brother, think of the pa tient, loving mother who has gone, you ar sure, to heaver. Do you not long to behol her again? She is waiting for you. Do no be the missing one from the family that sh prayed over for years. You will find resand peace in him, for "his yoke is easy an his burden is light," and you will find hel and encouragement with his people. Wi you come?

The Old Rose-covered Cottage."

CAL OGBURN.

"So, then, they are no more twain, but one flesh." -Mark 10:8.

An old landmark familiar to every person ho resides in the semitropical city of - is a rose-embowered cottage that ever fails, on account of its unique beauty, arrest and hold the attention. It was uilt many years ago when the town site as "first laid out," and is still the property f the original owner. All the other primive structures in that thriving city have ong ago been replaced by more elaborate nd substantial buildings, but this one still emains-"the relic of a bygone generaon."

Sometime in the distant past a "climbing ose" was planted by the side of the little ottage, and as the seasons came and went nd went and came, it continued to grow. he cottage, never prepossessing in its ppearance, and never intended to be anyning more than a "temporary tenement," radually fell into decay, until it is no nger habitable, but the rosebush has clamered up the weather-beaten walls, and eered in at the half open doors, and crept rough the broken windows, and twined bout the low eves, and thatched the mossovered roof till the dilapidated old structre is almost hidden from view by the perabundant wealth of bright-green folige and great profusion of delicate pink ossoms. And such fragrance as fills the r for blocks around! Like perfume-laden phyrs from paradisaical gardens or fields lysian!

There seems to be no incongruity whatver between the dilapidated old house and e beautiful rosebush. The cottage appears ery naturally to have been built primarily afford a suitable support for the climbg rose, and only secondarily to be the ome of the builder, while the very purpose or which the rose was planted was to cling and beautify the house. Inseparable ompanions for so many years, it would be rong to divide them now. He would be a andal who would dare to do it.

APPLICATION.

We have all seen something like thisay, something more beautiful, of which is is only faintly suggestive—in the lives of husband and wife. Those whom we knew, erhaps, were very ordinary people—not articularly wise, or talented, or well eduated—just "common folks"—and living in extraordinary way, until some great misfortune came to them. The husband, it may be, lost his health, or hope, or mind, and he lived on, oh, such a sad life, gradually falling more and more into decrepitude, like the old house going into decay, and we have seen the wife, with true womanly skill, love and wisdom envelop him with tender sympathy and anticipate his daily needs with gracious care until we have almost been constrained to say, "The one is the complement of the other, and it would be wrong to separate them." Is it any wonder the wife is broken-hearted when the old house, to which she has been so long clinging with such fragrant love, is at last torn down by the great Destroyer and she is left alone? No, not at all, for "the twain had truly become one flesh," as they had lived and sacrificed and suffered and grown old together.

Let every husband stop and take sufficient time to thank God-and his wife, especially the latter-for her unselfish devotion to Jesus Wants You.

EFFIE M. DAUPHIN.

Yes, he wants you. It does not matter how sinful you have been, or are now, for he says: "I came not to call the righteous, but sinners to repentance" (Mark 2:17). He wants you to say to yourself, I will try to live a better life from this time on. Ask him to help you to do it and he will.

He is so near, all you have to do is to speak to him and he will hear. Let "Lord, help me," be your constant thought and you will be surprised to find how easy it will be for you to do right.

And do not try to look ahead for a month, a year or a lifetime, but think each morning, I will try just for to-day not to do a wicked act or think of wicked things. If evil thoughts come into your mind, try to dismiss them as quickly as possible by thinking of something good.

If some one that you knew was very wealthy would say to you: "Come with me and I will give you a beautiful home. We must take a journey over a rough road to get there, but I will go with you and help you over all the rough places. Part of the way will be pleasant, with flowers and birds and the beautiful sunshine to cheer us on our way, and when we are passing over the rough places we will sing to cheer each other, and think of how soon we will reach the end of our journey and how happy we will then be, with no more sin, sickness or sorrow," how gladly you would go with himwould you not? Jesus invites you to go with him to a home in heaven.

Listen! can you not hear his sweet, gentle voice calling to you: "Come unto me all ye that labor and are heavy laden and I will give you rest?"

Conversation.

T. H. BLENUS.

There is, perhaps, no talent which has a more far-reaching influence than the talent of oral conversation. Our S vior has made it the criterion for heart-judgment: "For out of the abundance of the heart the mouth speaketh. A good man out of the good treasure of the heart bringeth forth good things, and an evil man bringeth forth evil things. But I say unto you, that every idle word that men shall speak they shall give account thereof in the day of judgment. For by thy words thou shalt be justified, and by thy words thou shall be condemned."

The gift of human speech, as a very preciously endowed faculty, has for its purpose the means of obtaining and imparting either useful information or the making of good impressions. A great part of human sin and human iniquity is of the tongue. Many seem to esteem it a trifling matter to give free rein to their conversation, and when restrained complain of the rigor and cruelty of that Christian requirement which demands that they should be under such terrible restriction. They seem to think that the Author of our being cannot be offended by a few trifling transgressions, a few little liberties of speech, used only as a means of amusement or enjoyment. As the average human life is not composed of great events and startling transactions, neither is the average human conversation made up of grand orations or splendid dissertations, but minute circumstances on the one hand and little words and expressions on the other. It is in the ordinary actions and conversation that the mind discovers itself, the heart is known, and the true life of the individual appears. It may seem a matter of but slight moment or concern how at times the tenor of the conversation runs, but when we remember that we are to be condemned or justified by our words it becomes a serious and important matter. Filthy communications, suggestive stories, even the relating of actual occurrences or experiences, when of a trifling or immoral tendency, can never be indulged in except at the sore expense of forfeiting the respect of the wise and the good, and lowering and debasing the dignity of human character, and hardening the heart against the influences of Christianity. I overheard a professed Christian relate a salacious story to a gentleman not long since, and when he had finished, instead of the expected laugh, the gentleman rebukingly remarked: "I would not have had my boy hear that story for a thousand dollars."

There are doubtless some who would shrink from open profanity, and yet who would engage in ordinary conversation in the use of terms and expressions as irreverent and unchristian as profanity itself. Such conversation is calculated to destroy reverence and respect for everything sacred and cherish in its influence a spirit of actual impiety.

A Rich Man.

Once in New England, says a writer in the Outlook, I was driving with an old farmer, and some of the men of the neighborhood came under criticism. Speaking of a prominent man in the village I asked, "He is a man of means?"

"Well, sir," the farmer replied, "he hasn't got much money, but he's mighty rich."

"He has a great deal of land, then?" I asked.

"No, sir; he hasn't got much land neither, but still he is mighty rich."

The old farmer, with a pleased smile, observed my puzzled look for a moment, and then explained:

"You see he hasn't got much money and he hasn't got much land, but still he is rich, because he never went to bed owing any man a cent in all his life. He lives as well as he wants to live, and he pays as he goes; he doesn't owe anything, and he isn't afraid of anybody; he tells every man the truth and does his duty by himself, his family and his neighbors; his word is as good as his bond, and every man, woman and child in the town looks up to him and respect him. No, sir, he hasn't got much land, bu still he is a mighty rich man, because he got all he wants."-Christian Endeavo

I walk by here every day, so we seen a good deal of you girls, and I e been wishing I could get acquainted h you, and become your friend, for I am retty good kind of a fellow. I believe would like me. So when I was passing t now, and Madge ran out and asked me come in and make a tramp go away, I delighted, for there was my chance I been looking for. And, now look! Just soon as I come in, all of them ran off ept you, and you had to stay."

Pete laughed. "Well, you see none of us w you," she said, "and mamma don't ow you. I've seen you passing here, and ndered why you did it so much. And besides, Madge is awful hard to get acquainted with. She don't pick people up. Madge is preserved. And Linda May is worse because her Aunt Dolly won't let her make up to strangers. But I don't mind you." Pete hastened to add, fearing she had been too plain-spoken. "Nobody bothers me. I say 'hello' to anybody. But Madge don't. Of course Jennie-that's my oldest sistershe's eighteen, she waits till somebody introduces you. Jennie is real cold."

"I expect I'd better be going, then, before she and Madge come back," said the young man, rising in some alarm.

"I expect you had," said Pete, "and I'll go play with my kittens. But I'll go to the gate with you."

"You can't think," he said wistfully, "how very much I would like to get to know you and Madge and Linda May and Letitia."

"Would you?" said the little girl. "Well, I tell you what. I'll manage it. Now, look here. You saw that tramp leaving the barn lot. I'm afraid he's going to bother mamma. That part's a secret. But if you can make him go away-leave the townwithout letting him know it was us got you to do it, that'll go a far way with me and Madge. You mustn't let anybody know the tramp bothered mamma. But run him away. His name is Nap. You can call him Nap. Then you come and tell me what you have done, and I'll work on Madge and try to get her to like you, and then you can come here sometimes, just once in a while, if you want to, and we won't mind. won't have to see Jennie, anyway, 'cause she stays in the house, mostly."

"And I'll take you and Madge riding," he suggested.

"Oh, will you? That will be nice. All right. Well, I see Madge coming back. Well, good-by."

"I'm glad he's gone," said Madge to Pete as she entered the front gate. "If I'd known he was going to hang around all day I wouldn't have called him in. He's so tiresome."

"Hasn't he a funny nose?" cried Pete.

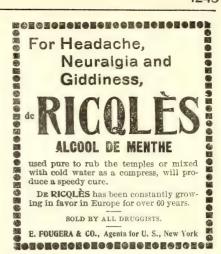

"And he talks so slow," said Madge. "And he hasn't anything to say; he just listens to you. I hope he isn't going to bother us. Pete, don't you get acquainted with that man. If you do he'll be here all the time; and I won't stand it either!"

When Mrs. Morris came home Jennie was with her; Madge and Pete told her how they had found the tramp's coat and knife in the loft, and how Nap had talked to them in the lot. Mrs. Morris, who was a small lady in black, looked very much troubled.

"And Nap said-" began Pete.

"Oh, Pete, quit calling him Nap," interrupted Madge. "It sounds like you know him."

"Nap said," insisted Pete, "Nap, Nap said that if you left the barn door open to-night, he would consider that an invitation to sleep in the loft! But if we latched it, he'd go away and not come to this place again. He said he wouldn't leave town, though. And he said you'd get into trouble if you latched that door. He talked real imperdent, mamma, but I told him nobody was afraid of him. I said to him, 'Nap, nobody is afraid.'"

"Oh, mamma," said Jennie, putting her arm about her mother, we will latch that door; yes, lock it, and how can he trouble us again?"

"No," said Mrs. Morris, "the door must be left open; wide open. Dear children, I dare not offend him."

"Why, mamma?" said Madge. "Mamma, did you ever know that tramp before he got to be a tramp?"

"Yes, Madge, I knew of him," replied her mother, passing her hand over her pale face.

"Who was he?" asked Pete.

"You must not ask me any questions," said the lady. "I cannot tell you anything. Oh, if he had not come you need never have known that there was this secret I have been keeping from you all your lives! You mustn't think that it is anything for which I am to blame. I was not the cause of this thing; I know to you it must seem a perplexing mystery. But it came-it existsand you can help me by not thinking of it."

"Mamma," said Jennie, "how can we help thinking of it, if the tramp stays in town? How long will he be here do you think?"

"Children," said the mother in desperation, "I will tell you this; he is waiting for money. And until I can supply it he is apt to haunt us."

"Was that what the letter was about?"

"Yes; he wants a hundred dollars. And I must give it to him. Then he will go away. You know how little we have to live on. But next month our interest will come in."

"Next month!" echoed Jennie. Must we have him about for a month? And a hundred dollars! And how do we know he will go away when he gets it?"

"He must go away," said Mrs. Morris. Then her composure left her, and she began to sob violently.

"Never mind, mamma," said Jennie, "we won't ask you anything more, and we won't tell a soul what you have said. And we can pinch and save and spare the money very well, if it must be."

"I think," said Pete, "that Nap will be gone before that month passes." She looked wise and began to whistle.

JESUS DINING WITH A PHARI-SEE.

The lessons of the present quarter have to do mostly with the ministry of Jesus in Perea, and we owe to Luke the story of Jesus' sayings and doings during this period. It was in the winter of 29, or the early spring of 30, A. D. Wherever the Master went now he was followed by a contingent of scribes and Pharisees, watching to catch some act or utterance by which they might secure his condemnation under either the Jewish or Roman law. He could not walk the streets or est his ordinary meals except under the strictest espionage. How his soul must have been grieved to see the world he came to save so bent upon his destruction.

One Sabbath day he was invited to dine at the home of a Pharisee. Rigid as they were in interpreting the Sabbath law against labor the Pharisees gave large liberty to the appetite, and feasts were common among them on that day. Accepting the invitation, the Savior found a company of these spies present. There was likewise there a man suffering with dropsy, who had either thrust himself into the midst of the company to reach the great Healer, or who had, perchance, been brought in by the Pharisees themselves to see whether Jesus would dare to violate the holy day by an act of healing. Jesus read their thoughts, and as though they had spoken it is said that he answered them saying: "Is it lawful to heal on the Sabbath day?" They made no reply. To answer in the affirmative would be to approve in advance the miracle they looked for him to perform. To answer in the negative would be to give the lie to the testimony God was bearing in the works of mercy by which Jesus had already persuaded the populace of his divine mission. Amid the silence the Master spoke the word of healing and the man went out cured of his dropsy.

Jesus would give his enemies an opportunity for repentance, so he appealed to their daily experience and natural feelings to prove that his act was right. "Which of you shall have an ass or an ox fallen into a pit and will not straightway pull him out on the Sabbath day?" This they were allowed by their hair-splitting interpretation of the elders' traditions to do. But how much better is a man than an ass or an ox? And how can it be other than a good deed to release from the bonds of affliction one of the children of God, even on the holy Sabbath? Their own hearts tell them that he is right and they wrong, but they will not acknowledge it, so stand before him silent again. The dropsy of their self-righteeusness and spiritual conceit was harder to cure than the physical dropsy of this poor man.

Jesus had already remarked how the guests maneuvered to secure the seats of honor at the feast. Then, as now, the little souls sought honor royal household to day there is bitter rivalry over the chief seats at the table, or precedence in the order of presentation at the court. our "aristocracy" of gilt and paste, the hollow mockery called "best society," is shaken to its foundation often by quarrels over the first places. The rabbis of Jesus' times were sticklers for their privileges. During the reign of King Alexander Jannaeus, he gave a feast to several visiting satraps from Persia, and invited likewise the Rabbi Simeon Ben Shetach. On entering the room the rabbi at once seated himself between the king and queen. Being asked the reason for his presumption, he replied that it was written in the Book of Jesus Ben Sirach: "Exalt wisdom and she shall exalt thee, and shall make thee sit among princes." Such selfish ambition was repugnant to the soul of Jesus. By a brief parable he showed the folly of their conduct. Pride thus pampered would sometime lead them to presume beyond bounds, and they would be invited to vacate the seat of honor to a worthier person, when they would with shame take the lower seat. How much better to take a humble seat and afterwards be bidden, Come up higher! "For whosoever exalteth himself shall be abased, and he that humbleth himself shall be exalted." All history is a commentary upon this saying. The proud ones of earth who sacrificed truth and honor that they might secure place and power have been felled into the dust of oblivion or buried beneath the maledictions of the world they would have mastered and abused. But the humble ones who bowed their shoulders to serve now wear on their brows the unfading laurels of renown and warm affection. The Son of Man, who came not to be ministered unto but to minister, has taught the world that he who would be chief among men must be their servant. The royal road of life is the road of humble ministry.

"Humble we must be, if to heaven we go; High is the roof there, but the gate is low."

And now this divine Guest, who never enters a home without bringing into it a benediction, will not forget the need of his host, and so turns to him with an earnest exhortation which the circumstances made very impressive. To this feast had been invited such as occupied prominent places in the eyes of the community, the "leading citizens" of the town, the magnates of the synagogue. Jesus himself had perhaps been included in the invitation because of the fame which attended his wonderful words and deeds. Whatever satisfaction the host might realize from having so exalted a company in his home, he could not know the sweetest reward of true hospitality. He looked for his return from the reputation that would accrue to him and the invitations with which he would be honored to future feasts at the homes of his present guests. "owe" to him a dinner, and society then, as now, kept careful account of such debts. A dinner for a dinner, a call for a call, was as much a part of their social law as an eye for an eye and a tooth for a tooth. Jesus gave to the company a higher ideal of hospitality. He told them to invite to their homes the poor and unfortunate, such as could not repay them with counter invitations. In so doing they would satisfy a real need, and the objects of their bounty would appreciate fully their generously laden table, while giving them the recompense of loving gratitude. Nor would those who thus exercised this grace fail of abundant reward at the hand of They should be recompensed at the resurrection of the just. With such promises the children of God may well cultivate this rare but beautiful grace of Christian hospitality. make the world better, the heart happier and heaven nearer.

Those so situated that they cannot attend schessions, taught by mail, as Principal John Schofield has had gratifying success by this meth of teaching. Mail students who will devote thours daily to practice, cannot fail to obtain general knowledge of shorthand in twenty weel. This is a short time to acquire a proression the will enable persons to become self-supportive. Those who attend school generally graduated about sixteen weeks, but this depends largely on tability and general knowledge of the pupil.

As a knowledge of shorthand is of no praffutility unless able to spill and compose correct students deficient in these lines are taught with extra charge. Shorthand and typewriting furnish lucrative, as well as pleasant employment for besses, but more especially for young ladies, there are always positions for those who a capable and competent.

RICH TOWARD GOD.

Tte Scriptures do not denounce riches as such. e nearest that they came to it is in the opening rses of the fifth chapter of James: "Go to, now, rich, weep and howl for your miseries that are ming upon you. Your garments are mothten. Your gold and silver are rusted," etc. t of course, it is a certain kind of rich that is ant-to be sure, the greater number of the

Our Savior, too, has sometimes been accused of posing riches just because they are riches. But do not find him indiscrimitately denouncing alth, nor refusing association with Levi, Joseph Arimathea, the rich young ruler and others. rtainly, he advises often that the rich shall give their wealth, and certainly he denounces in no easured language the love of money (a different ing from money) and the setting of one's heart on riches. It is not wealth, but the dependence on wealth that our Savior opposes.

After all, however, it is not to destroy but to fill that the Master came. It is not to emasize the negative but the positive element of things, and the phrase which forms our subet is quite in keeping with his spirit. It is h toward God that he would have us be. hether we be rich in goods or poor in goods is rely subsidiary. The essential thing is to be h toward God.

The poor in spirit are rich toward God. They ve no exalted claims of high place or pretenns of pre-emineace. They merely seek what y deserve-companionship with God. Bro. exander Procter, of Independence, Missouri, o was one of the greatest Americans of this peration, who might have occupied a large ce in the world's eye if he had sought it, sat ler the trees and among the flowers of his me for many, many years, and though he had le, yet he was not poor. His was a humble da loving spirit. He was a man of great, tow-ng character. He said: "God is here in my rd and garden. Every day I talk with him, and talks with me." There he sat for many weeks months, waiting for death to come, talking

The Scriptures often speak of those who are h in the world's goods, and yet know not that y are poor and lean and naked and miserable. ere are others who seem to be poor and misere, who nevertheless are rich-rich in a deep ationship, a sweet companionship, with God, of ich the world knows nothing. Phillips Brooks ks of many an obscure person-perhaps a man with a little hidden home—a two room tage with a grass plat and a bird-cage, and yet ose life is full of divine presence—rich toward

We all like to associate with those who are npetent and powerful. It is wonderful how ne people are pleased to talk of their well-tofriends. When a rich man goes down the eet it is amazing to see the number of those o seek to greet him and show that they are close terms with him. But the difficulty with the relationships as these is that so many of the called rich are not really rich. The thing for to do is to seek friend*hip with those who are ally rich—rich toward God. It is worth while the rich—rich toward God. It is worth while feel that we are closely acquainted with Alexder Procter. John Bunyan, Thomas a' Kempis,

Bethany Reading Courses.

The Bethany C. E. Bible Courses.

The purpose of the management of the Bethany C. E, Reading Courses to devote October, November and December exclusively to their course in Bible study is meeting with most hearty indorsement. The new schedule seems to us very wise. It enables the readers to concentrate attention and to secure better results. There is certainly no better way to begin the year's work in all our churches than by a systematic study of the Word of God, and we are certain this movement will meet with a very hearty response from all our churches. We append a few notes of commendation which has come to us:

KNOWLEDGE SHOULD BE DEFINITE.

The change in the methods of the Bethany C. E. Reading Courses is a distinct advance on their already successful past. Concentration of attention on one line of study at a time cannot fail to result in better work. Nothing is so much needed in a day when critical theories are much exploited as a real knowledge of the actual contents of the biblical writings. It is not enough to preserve our faith in God and his revelation that we have an impression that something akin to this or that is found omewhere among the books of the Bible. A scientific age demands that our knowledge of facts shall be clear-cut. The originators of the Bethany Reading Courses are to be congratulated on their substitution, from the outset, of progessive methods of Bible study for the hazy pretenses which, with the generality of Christians, had preceded. There is ground for hope that, on the basis of the work now being done in these "courses' we shall, in the not too distant future, have some really well-equipped corps of teachers in four Sunday-schools. A. M. CHAMBERLAIN.

Alliance, Ohto.

HOW SHALL IT BE DONE?

How shall an interest in systematic Bible study be aroused? This is a hard proposition. But the fact that it is difficult makes it all the more im-

The Bethany C. E. Reading Courses will no doubt contribute largely to the solution of this problem. And now as the months of October, November and December are to be devoted exclusively to Bible study by this course, it is earnestly hoped that a large number of C. E. Societies will organize for this work. I would like to urge this upon the young people of Kansas. Our societies are not doing nearly what they should in this direction. Let us begin at once to make awends for our past neglect. Who will be the first to report the organization of a Bethany Reading Course? W. S. Lowe.

Topeka, Kas.

EVERY ONE SHOULD LEND A HAND.

The chief advantage that the Jew had over any other people in antiquity was that to him were committed the oracles of God. The Bible is the most instructive and at the same time the most fascinating book in the world. It is the one book that never ceases to charm the reader. It is more precious than gold; yea, than much fine gold; it is sweeter than honey and the droppings of the honeycomb. Those who have read and studied it most can testify with the prophet of the Lord: "Thy Word was found and I did eat it, and thy Word was to me the joy and rejoicing of my heart." No one can do a friend or a neighbor or an acquaintance a better service than to call his attention to the infinite treasures of wisdom and knowledge found in the Bible and to prevail upon him to make these treasures his own. That is the object of the Bethany C. E. Reading Courses at the present time. Every minister of the gospel and every

Does the Work

No Surgical Operation, No Pain, Trifling Expense—A Simple, Harmless Remedy, but it Does the Work.

There are some people who have piles as frequently and regularly as other people have colds.

Any little bowel trouble will bring them on, any extra exertion, as in lifting, will produce them, and in fact will often appear without any apparent provocation. Piles, however, are much more serious than a cold, as the tendency is always to grow worse until the trouble becomes deep seated and chronic, or develops into some fatal rectal disease. While there are many pile remedies which give relief, yet there is but one which not only gives instant relief but at the same time makes a p cure, and that is the well-known Pyramid Pile Cure.

This remedy is composed of simple, harmless vegetable ingredients, but combined so effectively and act so promptly and thoroughly that it cures every form of piles whether itching, blind, bleeding or protruding.

In long standing cases the Pyramid Pile Cure has proven to be the only certain cure except a surgical operation, and its advantages over an operation are many, as it is painless, cause; no delay or interference with daily occupation and last but not least, it is cheaper than any surgical operation could possibly be.

FURNISHES NEEDED PREPARATION.

The Bethany Reading Courses for the last three months in 1900 are to be confined exclusively to Bible study. No better way could have been devised to end the century. The twentieth century will open with many fateful problems to be considered and settled. The young people especially, who will soon be in the midst of serious responsibilities which the proper solution of these problems will involve, need the "light upon the pathway," which can come alone from the Word of God. A new and earnest and intelligent study of THE BOOK is the best possible preparation for these responsibilities. More and more the Bible standpoint must prevail. The people who know the Bible best will be best qualified for service in the upheavals and reconstruction which society is to pass through. The Bethany C. E. text-books are admirably adapted to aid in acquiring this better knowledge of the Scriptures.

Some Books About China.

While the public eve is turned upon China and the public mind is busy with the problem of the destiny of the Empire and the bearing of the recent war npon it, many of our readers will doubtless wish to make themselves better acquainted with the general situation in China and the events which have led up to the present crisis. The following books are among the most important recent contributions on the subject. They are not all new, but have all been published within the last six years and may be considered as fairly up

THE BREAK-UP OF CHINA, with an account of its present Commerce, Currency, Waterways, Armies, Railways, Politics and Future Prospects. By Lord Charles Beresford. Harpers. 1899.

This important volume is in the form of a report made by Lord Beresford on the return from his mission in China in 1898-9. He was commissioned by the British Associated Chambers of Commerce to investigate a number of questions of importance to those who have commercial relations with China. His own high official and social position and the commission which he held, gave him exceptional opportunities for seeing what the ordinary tourist cannot see. His book is a brief in favor of maintaining the integrity of the Chinese Empire as "essential to the honor as well as to the interests of the Anglo-Saxon race." Lord Beresford interpreted his commission broadly and studied, not only strictly commercial data, but those questions of international policy and civil and military administration, which are vitally connected with commercial interests. A study of the Chinese army, for example, leads to the conclusion that the government could not guarantee the protection of foreign commercial interests in China on account of the inefficiency of its military and police service.

CHINESE CHARACTERISTICS. By A. H. Smith. Revell. 1894.

This is a series of essays on the various characteristics of the Chinese people under such heads as "Economy," "Industry," "Politeness," "Conservatism," etc. Something of interest is perhaps sacrificed by so large an emphasis upon the general at the expense of the particular, but the author takes pains to illustrate copiously from his own long experience the several characteristics which he enumerates. The value of such generalization depends on the breadth of the basis of observation which underlies it. Mr. Smith has had twenty-one years of residence in China, and he contributes many suggestions to the understanding of those things which make China different from other nations.

A CYCLE IN CATHAY, or China South and North, with Personal Reminiscences. By W. A. P. Martin. Illustrations and Map. Revell. 1896.

There are few books about China more comprehensive and generally satisfactory than this. The author has been in China forty-five years, partly as missionary and partly as an employee of the Chinese Government. Unlike the perceding book, this deals largely with particulars and leaves the reader to form his own generalizations. It contains much history, politics and description of land and people woven into a delightful narrative.

Of all the books about Eastern Asia there is none that I, personally, read with more interest and satisfaction than Henry Norman's "Far East." The author adds to his solid attainments as a student of Asiatic affairs, a contagious enthusiasm for traveling and adventuring and a faculty for picturesque description and racy narration. It is a big book about a far-away subject and one full of complications; but it is no penance to read it. The possessions and prospects of the several European Powers are treated successively-Great Britain, France, Russia, Spain (this was before her loss of the Philippines) and Portugal. FACTS ABOUT CHINA. By W. Remfry Hunt. Christian Pub. Co. Pp. 57. $.25.

This little book gives as much valuable information about China, accurately and concisely stated, as one is apt to find anywhere within equal limits. It describes the salient characteristics of the Chinese people, their land, their civilization and their religion, and states particularly those facts which determine the character of China as a mission field. The political question in China is inextricably complicated with religious and commercial questions and, although this little book does not treat of the "Eastern Question" in the political sense, it gives much information which will help the reader to understand it.

A STORY OF THE CAPTIVITY

BY J. BRECKENRIDGE ELLIS.

This is the latest work issued from the press of the Christian Publishing Company. The author is already known as a writer of rare power. His books, "King Saul," "In the Days of Jehu," and "The Fear and Dread of Kings" have been favorably received, and have won him an enviable reputation, which will be greatly enhanced by this new volume.

"Shem" is a story which, in plot and sustained interest, ranks with the best modern fiction. It deals with an interesting period of Biblical history—the days of King Zedekiah and the Babylonian invasion, throwing a flood of light on the relation between the Jews and Egypt on the one hand, and the Babylonian Empire on the other. The old story of human love triumphing over obstacles is told in a way to hold the reader's interest to the end.

"Shem" is a volume of 299 pages, neatly printed and bound. Price, FIFTY CENTS.

Book Notes.

"Shem, a Story of the Captivity," by J. Breck ridge Ellis, is an historical romance of the f rank. It is equal in merit to any story that been published in the last decade—a decade thas produced such works of fiction as "Quo Vsd "When Knighthood Was in Flower," "Tekla": "Richard Carvel." The author tells his tale graphically that the reader seems to be living moving in old Jerusalem, taking part in the fense of the city against the armies of Babyl The volume is printed on good paper, in a that may be easily read, is bound in heavy maniand the price is Fifty Cents.

"Missionary Addresses," by A. McLean, has a wide circulation, but there are still a grany persons who should have the work, who he never read it. CURRENT EVENTS.

The attitude of the several Powers toward ermany's demand upon China is being radually disclosed, with a deliberateness hich is characteristic of European diploacy, and it is becoming more and more robable that Germany will be left in a nely and awkward position. Salisbury's ormal answer has not yet been sent, but is oral statements show that Great Britn's attitude will be the same as our own. ussia also suggests that provision for the unishment of the Boxers should be a part of ne peace negotiations, rather than a prelimary to them. France agrees with Russia, nd the position of Japan is similar. The riple Alliance still holds together, but the apport of Italy and Austria is a matter of ight consequence in this affair. German apers have devoted much space to acrid mments upon the crudity and feebleness American diplomacy and have spent so uch vigor in showing how inconsequential e our opinions on the Chinese situation, at it is very evident that they do consider a serious factor in the case. The formal der has been sent to Gen. Chaffee to send e main body of his troops to Manila, reining in Pekin as a legation guard only 400 of the present 5,600. It is underood that these are not to be under the mmand of the German Commander in-chief the allies, Count von Waldersee. ount has already arrived at Tien-Tsin and e dispatches call attention to the fact that lly German, Russian and French flags were splayed to welcome him. There has been rumor that Von Waldersee may undertake back up Von Buelow's demand with the erman troops and precipitate a war indeendent of the allies. He has cabled home at the situation is more serious than is enerally believed. His serious view may partly the unconscious result of a natural esire to do something, now that he is there.

The foreign ministers in China have all ent unofficial notes to Prince Ching, sugesting the return of the Emperor to Pekin a means of proving to the Powers that der has been restored and that the govnment is strong enough to take care of self. Minister Conger, however, says that e does not think the Emperor will consent "come into the camp of his ene nies." onsul-General Goodnow, of Shanghai, has eceived word through the Chinese Director Railways and Telegraphs that an impe al edict has been issued d-priving Prince can of his salary and official servants ending his trial by the Imperial Cl n Court, the judgment of which alone members of the royal family are amenable, and designating four other high officials for trial. Information is too meagre to warrant the assertion that China is taking up in good faith the work of punishing the responsible authors of the Boxer outrages, according to the suggestion in the American reply to Germany's note. It looks that way at present and it will be lucky for China if it is so.

There is ground for a lively hope that the strike of the coal miners is fairly on the way toward a settlement, and that upon terms favorable to the miners. Although still refusing to recognize the Union, the operators have apparently agreed to arbitrate. There is probably a good deal of truth in the assertion that political motives have been brought to bear. Archbishop Ryan, who has been wisely active from the beginning in trying to bring about a settlement, called Mr. Hanna's attention to the blighting effect of the strike upon the Republican prosperity argument in the campaign. Mr. Hanna passed the word to J. Pierpont Morgan, who is deeply interested in anthracite, and Mr. Morgan mentioned the matter to the other operators, especially the managers of the nine "coal roads." There is a rumor that Cardinal Giobons will be asked to act as arbitrator, but that is only one of several rumors in which various parties are named. Archbishop Ryan himself would not be unacceptable. If either of these is chosen, it will not be as archbishop or cardinal, but as prominent citizens of recognized integrity and fairness. It is said that the probable basis of settlement will be an increase of 10 per cent. in the wages of the men, without recognition of the Union. The Union can stand it not to be technically "recognized," if it gets what it has been fighting for. Mr. Mitchell, President of the Union, says a concession of 10 per cent. would be a great victory for the strikers. The number of striking miners continues to increase rather than to diminish and there is no immediate prospect that the strike will break down, even if the settlement is deferred longer than now seems probable. About 134,000 men have now quit work. There have been no serious outbreaks of violence since the unfortunate casualties reported last week.

At the Paris Exposition, the court of last appeal of the Jury of Award has finished its work and the final reports are in. To French exhibitors, of course, went the largest number of prizes of all grades, just as the greatest amount of space in the Exposition had been given to them. The immense numerical preponderance of French exhibitors is a sufficient explanation of the assignment of the greatest number of prizes to them. It does not show the absolute superiority of French products above all others; much less does it show that the Jury of Award was unduly favorable to France. Of all foreign countries, the United States makes by far the best showing in the report of the Jury. Although Germany received more grand prizes by about twenty, the United States ranked first in each of the other classes of awards: gold, silver and bronze medals and honorable mentions.

Mr. Michael Davitt, Irish member of Parliament and a journalist as well as a politician, has returned from South Africa in a different frame of mind from that in which he went. He went out fired with enthusiasm for the Boer cause and sent back newspaper articles about the brave things which he expected them to do and the heroic stand which he expected them to make. He comes back, to use his own word, "disillusioned." They did not trust him, he says. They refused to give him the information which he needed in writing his articles in their behalf. (That in itself is enough to "disillusion" any newspaper man.) He is indignant at their failure to make at Kroonstad the noble stand which he had predicted that they would make. They had 10,000 men in a strong position, he says, and their action was little better than running away. And now, says Mr. Davitt, they are keeping up a futile resistance, in spite of the useless loss of life which it involves, "for the one object of heaping up the bars of gold they are taking from the mines and of accumulating and hording them in obedience to the dictation of that old man Paul Kruger."

Gen. John M. Palmer, whose death occurred on Sept. 25, was a prominent figure in Illinois politics for more than half a century. To the younger generation he is best known as the gold Democratic nominee for the presidency in 1896. Gen Palmer was an ante-bellum Democrat and a friend and follower of Stephen A. Douglas. He broke with Douglas on the Kansas Nebraska bill, and supported Lincoln in his senatorial canvass in Illinois in 1858 and in both of his presidential campaigns. His war record in the Union army was good. In the days of reconstruction, when slavery and secession had ceased to be the paramount issues, he returned to his old political home in the Democratic party, from which he again seceded four years ago on the silver question. While he has never been what could be called a mugwump, unless his course in the last election could be so defined, Gen. Palmer was a man upon whom the demands of party fealty rested but lightly. He did not assume, as the manner of some is, that his own party must inevitably take a position which he could approve upon every new issue, and three times he proved his independence by a change of allegiance.

James Howard has been found guilty by the courts of Kentucky of the murder of William Goebel and has been sentenced to death. The evidence against Howard was largely circumstantial but many incriminating statements from his own lips were brought forward as evidence of his guilt. It is said that immediately after the shooting of Gov. Goebel, he admitted and even boasted that it was his act. He is quoted also as saying: "When I shoot I always get either money or meat, and this time I got both." An attempt, based upon this suggestion, to prove that Taylor paid Howard for the work, failed. The date of Howard's execution is fixed for Dec. 7, and an appeal will probably do no more than postpone it for a month or two.

An important dispatch from Consul Mc-Wade, of Canton, China, confirms the report referred to elsewhere, that the Emperor has issued a decree punishing Prince Tuan and his colleagues for their part in the recent outrages. Under date of October 1, he cables the Secretary of State at Washington as follows:-"Decrees just issued. Emperor blames Ministers for whole trouble. Orders Tuan, Kangi and other officials degraded and punished by imperial courts. Emperor holds Tuan and others entirely responsible for bloodshed." A further dispatch from Minister Conger notifies the State Department that he has received notice from Prince Ching that he, EarlLi, Jurg Lu and Viceroys Tin Kun Yi and Chang Chip Tung will act in concert in negotiations for peace. It is believed that the appointment of Jung Lu or Yung Lu is not likely to be satisfactory to the Powers, as he has been in too active sympathy with Prince Tuan and the Boxers. He is Generalissimo of the imperial troops, and is regarded as mainly responsible for the attack on the legations. This being the case, this Government might reasonably object to his serving on the Peace Commission, which must necessarily pass on his own punishment. It is gratifying, however, to note the fact that the Emperor realizes the necessity of inflicting punishment upon the chief offenders in this barbaric treatment of foreigners.

Since the paragraph concerning the strike of the miners was written, it develops that the proposition of the operators to increase the wages of the miners ten per cent. does not prove acceptable to the miners, and the strike does not seem to be as near an end as we had hoped. There was a reduction in the price of powder also from $2.75 per keg to $1.50, but this difference is to be taken into account in figuring the net advance of ten per cent. So far as indications go at this writing, there is general agreement among the strikers to reject this offer on the ground that it includes no recognition of the union and does not remove other grie vances complained of by the miners. It is declared by one of the mine operators that any advance in the price of coal will have to be paid for by the public. Of course it is not to be expected that the railroads will voluntarily relinquish any of the exorbitant charges they are making for carrying anthracite coal. The public does not ask that the miners work at starvation wages in order that they may have cheaper coal. The people of this country generally believe that the laborer is worthy of his hire. They would like very much, however, to see a fairer distribution of profits between the railroads, the mine operators and the miners. What effect this rejection of the offer of the operators will have upon the proposed arbitration, we do not yet know, but we should like very much to see the principle of arbitration resorted to in the settlement of this strike, and become an established precedent as a method of settling labor disputes.

A CHINAMAN'S CRITICISM OF CHRISTIANITY.

The Secretary of the Chinese Legation in London, Ioan Chen, has recently contributed an article to the Daily Mail of that city replying to a recent contribution by Julian Ralph on Chinese Ignorance and Superstition, which has been deemed sufficiently important to be cabled in part to this country. The cable dispatch calls the article a piece of "superb but sacrilegious logic." Referring to the practice of Chinamen in endeavoring to keep off devils by building on the roof of their houses a little breastwork of cement two or three feet long and three or four inches high with beer-bottles stuck in it, muzzles outward, the sarcastic Chinaman says:

"It is said the Americans spend annually $200,000,000 in propitating their gods and devils. I do not hesitate to say that the Chinese are able to do the same thing just as effectively for a much larger population for less than half this sum. Many Roman Catholic cathedrals in Europe and America cost at least a million sterling. None of them is more effective in warding off devils than the simple little fort the Chinaman builds at the top of his house. Inexpensive beer-bottles are just as good in keeping off devils as the largest bells ever erected.

"If any doubt this, we Chinamen ask a competitive trial.

"Various other little devices, which some ignorant and superstitious Chinamen use, will be found quite as effective as the more elaborate and more costly paraphernalia used in Europe and America for the same purpose."

The challenge thrown down by this educated pagan, the believers in Christianity ought to be willing to accept. If it has any meaning to it, it is that in the view of this disciple of Confucius these Chinese superstitions are as effective in restraining the evil in human nature, in eradicating that evil and in cultivating the virtues of truthfulness, of honesty, of purity of life, as is Christianity. If Secretary Chen can demonstrate the truth of this proposition, it would relieve the Christians of various countries of any obligation to send the gospel to China Nay, more: If Christian people are not able to demonstrate the utter falsity of the statement, and to show beyond all reasonable denial that Christianity exerts a purifying a renewing and an elevating influence is human life and character, giving it higher aims, nobler ideals and truer principles, an producing a higher type of manhood and of womanhood than the ancestor worship of Christianity, that it should become the universal religion because of the superior blessings it confers on mankind, cannot be mad good.

What about the devils of falsehood o treachery, of barbaric cruelty, of unreason ing fanaticism, of physical and moral im purity, of intellectual and spiritual stag nation, of degrading superstition? Has Con fucianism, or Buddhism, or Taoism shows themselves able to exorcise these demons They have had centuries in which to make the test. Christianity, in its purer form has had only a short time in which to de monstrate what it can do for China and for the Chinese, but in this brief time it has produced proof abundant for those who have eyes to see, of its power to regenerate China and to put it on the pathway of progress when it shall have free course to run and be glorified. There are enough Chinese Chris tians whose lives have been ennobled and purified by Christianity to satisfy the mine of any one on this subject who is open to conviction.

But Chen is of the earth, earthy; he is thoroughly materialistic in his views of life Hear him state what China needs:

"What we require in China is scientific menmen educated in some of the concrete science that we do not understand to the same extent tha you understand them in England. We do not object to your doctors; and we admire their skill We do not object to your engines, and neither do we object to any of your scientific men, so long at they do not interfere with existing institutions."

In other words, according to this Chinese diplomat, China needs our material civiliza tion-its education and science, its modern inventions and machinery-but it does no care for the regenerative religion that lies behind all this material progress and has made it possible. China does not need Chris and his great ideas concerning God, and worship, and duty, and the life to come, and human nature, and human rights, but she only needs our scientific knowledge and ou engines! The paragraphs we have quote above make it apparent that what Cher needs is to have his eyes opened and hi heart renewed, so that he can see something of higher value than engines and telegraph and warships.

We have no doubt that even scientific education would do much to relieve China from the load of superstition which is at present oppressing the people; but its deep est need is Jesus Christ, the Regenerator of human hearts, and the Purifier of individual domestic, social, industrial and political life This, too, is the greatest need of America for even here Christ is exercising only a limited dominion, as there are vast areas of thought and life from which He is practically shut out. But the difference between the civilization of the United States, such as it is, and the civilization which prevails in China, is the difference between the religion of Christ and that of Confucius and the other religions of China.

Christianity, like every other religion. must stand or fall by what it is able to do for humanity. It has no reason to fear comparison with any other religion when measured by this standard. It is a matter of profound regret, however, that we allow Christianity such a poor opportunity to show what it is able to do for individuals and for a nation, if it only had complete sway. Let us hope that in the century to come we shall be able to point to our own beloved nationits laws, its institutions, its customs, and the reign of justice and righteousness throughout all our borders-with much more convincing proof than we can at present, to show what Christ can do for a nation.

THE THINGS THAT ARE CÆSAR'S.

While the words of Jesus admonishing His disciples to "render unto Cæsar the things that are Cæsar's" contain a warning that is appropriate for any year and any season, there are occasions when the admonition is especially timely. Indeed, the Master himself, when he spoke the words, was not throwing out a general exhortation to good citizenship, but was answering a direct question about a specific duty of citizens then and there, namely, the payment of taxes. And so, when those periodical occasions recur which call for the exercise of the most important functions of citizenship, it is well to remember that there are still certain "things that are Cæsar's," and that these must be rendered as conscientiously as an honest man pays his dehts.

In the Roman Empire the chief duty of a subject was to pay his taxes. Especially was this true of the conquered nations who peopled the provinces and furnished the financial support of the Empire. Having done that, they had performed their whole duty toward the government under which they lived, and were doing all in their power to maintain it. But the matter is not so simple under a democratic form of government, for here the state looks to the citizen, not only for financial support, but for its ultimate authority and for the general direction of its policy. things that are Cæsar's"-that is, the duty of the citizen to the state-takes on a correspondingly wide interpretation.

The theory of democratic government is that the judgment of all the people is, in the long run, safer and saner than the judgment of any one person or of any class of people. But the practical application of this theory is conditioned by the assumption that it is possible to get a substantially universal expression of the popular judgment. Unless this is possible, democracy fails. The founders of our nation rejected the idea of the government of the whole by a part, even by the best part. And yet the many respectable and intelligent men who hold themselves aloof from the contamination of politics, while the corrupt and unintelligent grasp at the reins of power, are practically disloyal to the principle upon which our government rests. Democracy is based on a magnificent optimism which holds that the average man can be trusted to direct the policy of the Republic. But the average falls too low when the mea of intelligence, education and conscience refuse to be counted or neglect to make their voices heard. It may be safe to trust the average man, but no optimist ever fell into a sentimentalism so weak and foolish as to be willing to commit the destiny of the government into the hands of the worst man. The average is none too high at best. It falls a little lower every time an intelligent and honest citizen fails to participate in a campaign or an election.

Pre-eminent, therefore, among the "things that are Cæsar's" in this age and land is an intelligent and conscientious vote from every loyal citizen. The state has a right to expect that. Taxes can be collected by a process of law, but a republic has no machinery by which to hale the reluctant voter to the polls. Let every reader of this paper, then, who has the legal right to cast a ballot, remember that it is also a patriotic duty to do so, and that, if he does not do so, his attitude toward the government is much the same as if he refused to pay his taxes—except that no legal proceedings can be taken against him.

In most of the states a new registration is necessary for the coming election. Find out at once where your place of registration is and register as soon as possible, and, when election time comes, cast an honest and intelligent ballot. Let us remember the words of our Lord how he said: "Render unto Cæsar the things that are Cæsar's."

CRIME AND HEREDITY.

In an address before the National Prison Congress at Cleveland, Mr. George Torrance, superintendent of the Illinois State Reformatory, declared that not more than 10 per cent. of the crime committed was due to heredity.

"Ninety per cent. of the young men convicted of crimes," says Mr. Torrance, "would not become criminals with proper surroundings, proper companions and proper attention."

Success in life is assured if "the boy is reared in a good neighborhood where he has other boy associates whose hopes and aspirations are to become worthy citizens, where he comes in contact with true ladies and gentlemen, and is given good literature to read."

On the other hand, if he is a witness of drunken brawls, and listens to profane and indecent language, and is brought in daily contact with degraded men and women, he will become a criminal. "The flower is blasted because of lack of water, and the apple by the sting of an insect."

This puts the whole responsibility upon society. If vicious conditions are created or permitted the resulting crime is due to the neglect of society. If people would give a little more attention to this view of the matter not only would crime be reduced but other blessings might be expected.— Post-Dispatch.

Very true indeed; and since it is true, would it not be worth while for a great political party to have something to say in its platform about the kind of environment it would seek to provide for the young, in case it came into power? The saloon, the brothel and the gambling hell-these are the trinity of evil agencies which make up an environment that multiplies criminals, fills our jails and penitentiaries, our reformatories and work houses, and rains the young men of the nation. Can any one who loves his fellowmen assume any other attitude toward these corresponding agencies than that of ceaseless hostility? \ There is only one open question for a Christian on this subject: "How can I most successfully oppose these evils?"

hour of Prayer.

WITNESSES.

(Acts 1:6 11: 2:29-32.)

[Uniform Midweek Prayer-meeting Topic, Oct. 10.] CENTRAL TRUTH: Christianity is based on facts; these facts must be testified to; and this testimony requires witnesses.

The chief work of the apostles whom Jesus selected and qualified for their mission was to be witnesses for Him; to testify what they had seen and heard. They were eye and ear witnesses of His works and of His teaching. They knew Him intimately before His crucifixion, and they saw Him and conversed with Him during the forty days between His resurrection and ascension. This was true of the original twelve with the exception of Judas, who committed suicide before the resurrection. Paul who, as he says, was "born out of due season," came into the apostleship later, but he also saw Christ after His resurrection, and heard words from His mouth, in order that he might be a qualified apostle and witness of the resurrection.

It was not until after the apostles had received power from on high, through the Holy Spirit given to them, that they were to begin their work of witness-bearing "in Jerusalem, and in all Judea and Samaria, and unto the uttermost part of the earth." Their testimony, therefore, would be of a twofold character; they could testify, not only to the fact of Christ's resurrection from the dead, but also to the gift of the Holy Spirit and the power received through that Spirit in equipping them for Christ's service. Their changed lives and calling had no explanation except in the facts which they proclaimed.

The passage cited from Peter's discourse shows that the apostles understood their mission to be that of witnesses for Christ. "This Jesus God raised up, whereof we all are witnesses." They were able to testify, from their actual knowledge, of the reality of Christ's appearance to them, and of his conversations with them after His resurrection from the dead, and they bore this testimony faithfully in the face of threats, of imprisonment and of death. It was this testimony of faithful, honest men, who knew whereof they affirmed, and who were willing to seal it with their blood, that shook the Roman Empire, overthrew paganism and multiplied converts to the new faith wherever these witnesses went.

In a very important sense the apostles have no successors. An eye and ear witness cannot have a successor. We have their testimony which has come down to us in the New Testament, and which is as convincing to-day as it ever was. They also possessed the Holy Spirit in a special measure and for a special purpose, which renders it impossible for them to have successors. They were the accredited and qualified representatives of Christ, to make known His will and to establish His church and kingdom in the world. They have no successors in that high office. In this respect they still occupy their apostolic thrones and wield the same authority to-day by their testimony as when they were here in the flesh.

There is an important sense, however, in which all Christ's disciples should be witnesses of Him. Discipleship implies such a personal knowledge of Christ and of His power to save as qualifies every believer to be a witness for Him. This witness bearing may be done in two ways: We may bear witness for Christ by confessing Him on all proper occasions and by bearing testimony to the reality of His power and of His friendship as a Savior. No Christian, worthy of the name, will refuse, when occasion demands, to say a word for his Master. Should any one refuse to do this through cowardice, he would be unworthy to be a disciple of Christ. It is to be feared that many of us are silent when a brave, manly word for Christ in the presence of scoffers would do great good. It is in this sense, no doubt, that Jesus says that "he that denieth me before men, him will I deny before my Father and the holy angels."

But we may also bear witness for Christ or against Him by our lives. Every noble and unselfish act we perform is a witness for Christ, and every life of holiness and of unselfish service is a constant and powerful witness, both to the reality and power of the religion of Christ. On the other hand we deny Christ when we choose the easy way or the popular way in preference to the path of duty.

Let us look closely into our hearts and into our past lives and see whether or not our testimony is for or against Christ. He would have us be witnesses for Him; are we witnesses against Him? Or, do we bear witness for Him with our lips, and nullify the testimony by our lives? Let us be very honest with ourselves, as, in the presence of the all-seeing Father, we ask ourselves whether the weight of our influence, the testimony of our lives, is for or against Christ.

PRAYER.

Almighty God our Heavenly Father, we thank Thee for the gift of Thy Son, and for the innumerable witnesses which Thou hast raised up in all ages to bear testimony in His behalf. We thank Thee for the privilege of bearing witness to what He has done for us in forgiving our sins and in filling our hearts with new purposes, new desires and new affections. We beseech Thee, our Father, for Thy Holy Spirit, that we may be so strengthened in the inner man that we may be able to bear witness continually by our words and by the silent influence of our lives in behalf of Him who loved us and gave Himself for us. And so, through this united testimony of Thy children, may Thy kingdom come and Thy will be done on earth as it is in heaven. In Christ's name. Amen!

Editor's Easy Chair

The October number of the Atlantic Monthly contains a series of personal letters from Janes Martineau, of England, to an American friend in Chicago, running through a series of thirty years from 1862 to 1892. These letters abound in lofty sentiments and breathe a spirit of reverence and devotion which is truly refreshing. In one of them he is speaking of a "half promise" he had made to some publisher to prepare a volume on the Ministry of Christ. He is almost regretting that he promised anything of the kind, and wonders at his "rashness" in so doing. His reason he thus states: "But it is more, I think, because that divine lifelike all things divine-cannot, to my present feelings, be truly rendered in treatment so regular and analytic as a book implies. It gleams on our purified vision in hints and streaks of beauty; and though these flow together into fragments of form, not only distinct but unique, yet every attempt to complete them disappoints one and produces a whole quite inadequate to the glory of its elements. So I begin to suppose that His personality is better left as one of those tender and holy mysteries that have power over us just because they represent, with the sweetest harmonies of our life, also the infinite silence in it that cannot be broken." Every writer on the life of Christ must have felt something of this same feeling in dealing with the theme that so far transcends human thought.

How much better it is to acknowledge the awe and mystery of a life and a personality, too great for our comprehension, than to seek, in the spirit of a superficial rationalism, to bring that life and personality within the limited range of our intellectual vision! Martineau did not have this feeling concerning any other person. In the same letter and in the same connection, he says: "With Paul it is quite different; and as he worked out his thought into explicit form. constructing it into something complex, grand and perishable, I can approach him as a human not a divine phenomenon and treat his doctrine as the philosophy of a spirit just redeemed." Who has not cherished such a hope as that which he expresses in the following lines: "But still I indulge in the dream of hope that toward the end of life a few years may be rescued for tranquil retirement; when I may gather up the fruits of past thought and experience, and find here and there something riper than I have yet been able to give." It is pleasing to know that the few years for "tranquil retirement" which he coveted were given to him, and that to an age far beyond the limits of the average worker he was permitted to have the full use of his remarkable powers to round up his life-work, "I cannot hope to do much," he says, "toward arresting the tendency in the age to materialistic or idealistic skepticism; but it is something to put on record a different type of thought in readiness for a time when the tide shall turn. I am more and more struck with the fact that it is not new beliefs or unbeliefs which a modern age advances into; but a new generation of men that is born into a recurring drift towards old beliefs or unbeliefs. There is, as far as I can see, absolutely nothing in our present scientific knowledge which weakens or changes, unless for the better, the philosophical grounds of religion. To-day's fear will assuredly pass away." That was written a quarter of a century ago, but it is fulfilled prophecy to-day.

In one of the letters Martineau refers to the death of his wife in terms so tender and beautiful as to give us a glimpse of his inner life and to show us his high conception of the marriage relation. "The year that is closing," he writes, "has been the saddest of my life and leaves me the survivor of a companionship most entire in thought and affection, from betrothal in 1822 to death last moath. A blessing thus prolonged I cannot be so faithless as to turn from gratitude into complaint. If I step into a darkened path I carry with me a blessed light of memory which gives at least a 'gloaming' though the sun is set, and promises a dawn when the night is gone. The short vigil will soon be over, and while it lasts neither the departed nor the lingerer can quit the keeping of the Everlasting Love." In a later letter he congratulates his bachelor friend on his marriage: "Let the single men laugh as they may, there are no more blessed angels of repentance in heaven or earth than the dear souls that carry us out of ourselves and make our homes." Let us hope that the great man's conception of marriage, of its meaning and its sacredness, and of its design to bring out of us that which is noblest and best may become more prevalent. Referring to the "Ethical" movement among the Unitarian societies in this country and the tendency to convert Christianity into a simple code of ethics, he says: "I do not myself believe in the efficacy of purely Ethical communions; short of the enthusiasm of Personal affection between the spirit of man and Spirit of God, the blending of Religion is not reached; and no permanent cohesion can be expected on the mere ethical ground of relations between man and men." Although a Unitarian, Dr. Martineau never adopted many of the radical ideas of that school.

The last letter in this series, written in October, 1892, "dips toward the horizon." There are in it premonitions of the coming end. He is now in his octogenarian years. "My tardiness," he writes, "is due not wholly to the habits of old age, but in part to the even course of a life withdrawn from the ferment of the world and rather listening to its voices than adding to them. You are on the stage; I do but sit among the audience. In that capacity I delight to be still a learner and a sympathizer, and hope to remain so till the curtain drops and the foot-lights go out." And then he speaks of a contemplated visit to "the scene of my first married home and the grave of my first child." How characteristic of old age! In the closing paragraph he says: "The year is closing solemnly upon us. Your beloved Whittier has left the world whose sins he so boldly rebuked and whose sorrows he so sweetly soothed. And now our noble Tennyson has aken his wealth of soul away from us, and no one remains who can tell us how its pathetic griefs and doubts and faiths have risen into a majestic joy." The great man was permitted to live seven years after this closing letter. What a splendid illustration his life is of how one may hallow old age with noble thoughts, with blessed memories, with tender sympathies and with glorious anticipations! It is grand to grow old in this way, but it can only be done by those who live in fellowship with God, who cherish the noblest ideals and who fill their souls with the purest and holiest thoughts which lay hold on eterpity and which make one's spirit a part of the eternal order.

Questions and Answers.

A good many people go to church to hear the preacher, rather than to worship God. Can you point out a remedy for this evil?

Preacher.

The best remedy, we think, for this popular misapprehension is to give proper time and emphasis to the feature of worship in the church service. The old-fashioned method of conducting a service was well calculated to give the idea that the real object of going to meeting was to hear the preacher. What went before was merely "introducing the worship." A wisely arranged order of service, giving due prominence to the music, to the reading of the Scriptures, to the prayers, to the observance of the Lord's Supper, is the most powerful educator as to the true nature of worship, and the real object of Christians assembling themselves together. Perhaps there are very few of our churches in which the order of service could not be improved in the interest of decorum, solemnity, impressiveness and reverence. The preacher, by his manner and by the emphasis he gives to the various parts of worship, can do very much to correct the misapprehension referred to, and to give a higher aim to cur church-going.

What are the proper questions to put to a candidate who presents himself for taptism and church membership? What is the proper form of confession? Timothy.

The proper qualification for baptism, according to the New Testament, is to be a penitent believer. The question, therefore, or questions, asked the candidate should be of such a nature as to elicit information on this point. The ordinary form of question among the churches of the Reformation is, "Do you believe, with all your heart, that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of the living God?" To this question another is often added which seems entirely pertinent and proper, in substance as follows: "Is it your desire and purpose to obey Christ in the ordinance of baptism and thus to enter His church and be His faithful disciple?" Some such question as the latter seems to be demanded by the very nature of the case in order to clinch the confession of faith and to commit the candidate thus openly and publicly to an expression of his desire and purpose to follow Christ in the Christian life. The answers to these questions are, of course, obvious enough, and they should be made in a clear, audible voice that the people may understand. This may seem to some like a short confession of faith, but it is as long as that made by Simon Peter, by Thomas, by Nathaniel and others who were accepted of Christ. It commits one to Jesus Christ, to receive his teaching, to obey his commandments and to labor for the promotion of his kingdom.

- 1. In a recent editorial entitled "Mr. Campbell on the Holy Spirit," you say: "What place is there for prayer, for divine guidance and comfort in times of p-rplexity and sorrow, under the theory that the only way God can answer our prayers is through the uritten Word that was given two thousand years ago?" Does the Word of truth lose its vitality by reason of age? Or does it not live and abide forever, and is it not a stream from an eternal fountain, ever deepening and everwidening?
- 2. You further say: "The truth is, those who pray effectually realize that they are in direct touch with God, and they expect and receive direct and from Him." Is the aid which I receive from you through the Christian-Evangflist any the less from God than it would be if given directly?
- 3. What greater calamity could befall struggling humanity than to be deprived of the actual knowledge they have that God makes them instruments in blessing, comforting and otherwise helping each other?

D. D. McLean.

Bowling Green, Fla.

- 1. No, the Word of God has not lost its vitality, and it is "a stream from an eternal fountain, ever-deepening and ever-widening," to those who have the Spirit of God and who are growing in grace and in the knowledge of our Lord Jesus Christ. It was no thought of ours, in the statement quoted from our editorial, to undervalue the power of the living Word, but to protest against that view of the divine administration which regards the work of the Holy Spirit as having been completed in the world when it inspired the writers of the New Testament, instead of being an everpresent force in the hearts and lives of Christian men to-day.
- 2. Again, our point was not to intimate that assistance received through the Holy Scriptures was not from God, but we must not limit God to the medium of the Holy Scriptures in His work of comforting, guiding and strengthening the Christian of to-day. Our brother may receive help from us through the Christian-Evangelist, and whatever spiritual strength he may derive from that source he is right in attributing to God. It does not follow, however, that we might not render greater assistance to him in times of trial and affliction by personal intercourse with him than we could possibly do through the paper. If this be true of us, how much more is it true of God!

- 3. This would indeed be a great calamity, but it is in no danger of befalling men by believing that God to-day hears our prayers and answers them in His own way, and not necessarily always through the agency of the Scriptures. It would take all the zest out of prayer if we should lose faith in the reality of actual communion with God in which we speak to Hin and He to us through His Spirit which bideth in us.
 - 1. Is the doctrine of restitution scriptural?
 - 2. How are we to understand 1. Cor. 5:5? F. M. Hess, M. D.

Berwick, Ill.

- 1. We presume "restitution," in this question, refers to making good, as far as in us lies, any wrong which we have done to another. Of course this is scriptural, and no repentance is genuine that does not restore, as far as possible, what has been unjustly taken from another.
- 2. The verse cited is a part of the direction given by Paul to the church at Corinth concerning the evil person who was in its fellowship. The church, being gathered together, was directed "to deliver such an one unto Satan for the destruction of the flesh, that the spirit may be saved in the day of the Lord Jesus." To deliver an offender unto Satan would be for the church to withdraw fellowship from him and no longer regard or treat him as a member of the body of Christ. Even this last resort is intended to save the offender by cutting off his false hope in the church and leave him to the power of Satan until by bitter experience he should learn that "he that soweth to the flesh shall of the flesh reap corruption," and should at last, perchance, turn in penitence and be saved in spirit.

In Matt. 22:37 Jesus said, "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God," etc. In Luke 10:25-27 the lawyer gave the answer to his own question "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God." Who gave the two great commandments, Jesus or the lawyer?

Jas. McGuire.

Highland, Kan.

Neither Jesus nor the lawyer gave the commandments mentioned above, but each one quoted them from the law—the law of God given by the inspiration of God. The difficult question is not who gave these commandment, but who of us keeps them.

What book, not too expensive, gives information concerning the hiding of the early Christians in the catacombs?

J. M. Hunter.

Coquille City, Oreg.

"Ben Hur," by Lew Wallace, contains a description of the catacombs and their use by Christians. If you have access to any encyclopedia, it will give you the necessary information under the word "catacombs."

LESSONS FROM THE CAM-PAIGN.

R. MOFFETT.

The American people are now being enlisted and enthused in the interest of about a dozen candidates for the presidency of the United States. These candidates stand for one or more doctrines which the advocates of them hope to see continued in practice, or at some early day enacted into law.

This is a noticeable feature, quite in contrast with divisions in the Christian world. Politicians-I use the word in the good sense-do not set forth political philosophies which cannot be reduced to practice. When the Republican party, in 1856, put into its platform, "No more slave states and no more slave territories," it meant the overthrow of the slave-holding power. The party which puts into its platform, "No more saloons," means the prohibition of the liquor traffic. The party that puts into its platform free trade or free coinage of silver at the ratio of 16 to 1, means a radical change in the nation's commercial and financial practices. The party that puts into its platform the surrender of recently acquired territory, means reversal of the present policy. The party that puts something into its platform which it does not mean to reduce to practice, ought to be outlawed.

Now the church has been divided on questions which have little to do with practice. What had Calvinism and Arminianism to do with the work of the church? Very little, except to hinder it. These were simply religious philosophies which divided the church and served no practical end. Politicians are wiser; and political divisions have a justifiable reason, because the several parties propose to do diverse things which have to do with the future condition and prosperity of the nation. If the church had given its attention to the work of Christ and had "sought first the kingdom of God" there would have been little occasion for division. Jesus Christ came to do, and he educated his apostles to do. His mission was to save men and set them to work to save the world. The church lost sight of this as the "paramount issue" when it set to work to formulate human creeds, which served only to divide. It seems to me the church is coming more and more to understand that its one great mission is to save men, and this means union-the breaking down of middle walls of partition. It means at last only two parties, the one for Christ and the other for Satan; the one for work that will enthrone Christ in the world, the other for work that will enthronc Satan; the one for all that is holiest and best, the other for all that degrades and destroys.

Again, the church can learn something from the methods of the great political parties. Jesus said the children of this world are wiser in their generation than the children of light. Politicians depend for success upon (1) thorough organization; (2) the liberal use of money; (3) the enlightenment of the people; (4) appeals in behalf of the welfare of the country.

The organization consists of (1) a platform on which the largest number of voters can stand and work together as one man. Many things which some of the voters would like to have in the platform are left out because there are also many voters who would bolt if they were put in. It is believed that a majority of the voters can be united on what is in the platform and that the vote implies nothing as to what may not be in it. The two great parties are alligned in this way. Smaller parties may be found as advocates of great questions and education along important lines without raising an issue with either of the great parties. The voter knows that one or the other of the two great parties will win. If he believes that it makes little difference which wins he may cast his vote to emphasize prohibition, or the need of a national divorce law, or the annihilation of the anarchists, or cheaper postage, or any other thing he conceives to be important and found only in one platform.

(2) The party depends upon the publication and distribution of literature which will enlighten the voter and emphasize the paramount issues. Advocates address the great multitudes on these great questions. A political campaign is a great elucator. The people come to see the differences and to weigh the comparative practical importance of the several political doctrines. True, some of these "stumpers" are the merest pettifoggers and mountebanks and some of the literature is colored beyond the warrant of facts, but on the whole the people are enlightened in a great degree on the questions before the people.

(3) The organization embraces a distribution of labor. There are departments of work and in these departments there are captains of tens and hundreds and thousands. These are chosen with reference to their ability to do what is needed and expected down to the smallest details. A great political party moves like an army under one great commander. Great meetings and small meetings are arranged for, "still hunters" are set to work—all to convince the voter and get him to the polls. Politicians set a high value on the unit, for one vote may determine the character of the national administration for four years.

(4) To reach the desired result there is a very liberal use of money. It is supposed that it will take a hundred millions of dollars to pay the expenses of this campaign. Headquarters must be rented in great cities, in the state capitals and in county seats and villages and townships. Speakers must be paid and reimbursed for expenses. Millions of pages of literature must be printed and distributed. Appeals must be made in behalf of individual and collective welfare, and above all in behalf of the honor, dignity and prosperity of the country. All this costs time and money.

There are lessons in all this for the church. In the campaign for Christ there is found nowhere that systematic organization, that earnest effort to enlist every church member in the work, that liberal use of money, that earnest and even passionate appeal in behalf of the highest good to individuals, to society, to nations we find characteristic of the great political parties. In all this I do not forget the many things in political workings that must be condemned; and yet, the church has not always been free from some of these same things. I believe the Lord is leading his people more and more to the qualities that make for righteousness and for the long-promised triumphs of his reign.

ROGER WILLIAMS AND RE-LIGIOUS LIBERTY-II.

W. H. ROGERS.

If the recent utterances in regard to Roger Williams shall incite to a new study of the development of religious liberty and of some of the great actors who were pioneers therein, their author will have rendered a service for which he will deserve much credit. A fresh study of Milton and Cromwell and Sir Harry Vane and Roger Williams not only keeps us from getting rusty, but it purifies and quickens the currents of our social, civil and religious life.

Roger Williams drank copiously at the fountain of religious liberty. He was the companion of Sir Harry Vane, who at the age of 24 was governor of the Massachusetts Bay Colony, and of whom Wendell Phillips has declared that "he was in advance of Winthrop, Adams and Franklin; that he projected ideas far into the future, and when a boy boldly announced the faith of the nineteenth century in the middle of the seventeenth." He was also on terms of intimacy with John Milton, whom he instructed in Dutch during his second visit to England And finally, he enjoyed the friendship of great Protector, Oliver Cromwell. Possibly overcopious draughts may have intoxicated him, rendering him somewhat unsteady in the pursuit of his goal, especially during his youth. His age at the time of his coming to America in 1631, where he at once became prominent, is variously estimated at from 25 to 31.

It is very difficuly to get a correct estimate of a man who lived and labored 260 or 270 years ago, and especially so in those times of transition and turmoil, when passion and prejudice ran high. Says Henry M. Dexter, who appears as a critic, not an advocate, of Roger Williams: "Those were days of free and rugged speech, when even the best of men sometimes allowed themselves to suspect and stigmatize the motives of others and to employ bitter words in so doing."

The writer enjoyed greatly the article by James Vernon, Jr., in the Christian-Evan Gelist of August 30th, and feels grateful for his clear statement of the facts of history. Yet, when a great historical character is under consideration the people should know all about him, his defects as well as his virtues. History and biography will not prove safe guides unless the facts in one case and the factors in the other are given faithfully. "Paint me as I am," said Cromwell, the friend of Roger Williams. The work should be done reverently and with entire candor, however, not flippantly and with bias.

Now, since Dr. Dexter pleads the case of Roger Williams' persecutors as against Roger Williams himself, I am inclined to consider his estimate of Roger Williams as reasonably correct. It is as follows: "There was so much of sweetness, wisdom and true nobility of character in the adult development of Mr. Williams as to make it hard for us to remember that he always had great faults. A hot-headed youth of determined perseverance, vast energy, considerable information, intense convictions, a decided taste for novelty, a hearty love of controversy, a habit of hasty speech and a religious horror of all expediency. With all this there was in him an abiding patience under trial and meekness toward reproof, a calm courage, a noble disinterestedness and public spirit and a predominant good temper in every strait and toward every opponent."

This testimony of Dr. Dexter, taken in connection with that given before, seems somewhat contradictory, and that is just the kind of a man Roger Williams seems to have been Roger Williams had the prophetic temperament, and to the purely academical or logical mind the prophetic habit is always contradictory. There were two Roger Williamses in very much the same sense that there were two Isaiahs. I once heard Principal Cave, of England, say that the two Isaiahs were the Isaiah of youth and the Isaiah of mature years. Whatever may have been his seeming youthful aberrations, it is certain that in the prime of life Roger Williams mellowed greatly, and Winslow says: "He was lovely in his carriage."

Let us hear Dr. Dexter further concerning the so-called apostle of religious liberty: "His eyes were so intently fixed upon a great ideal line of duty stretching onward toward the far future and upward toward the judgment seat, as to withdraw his consciousness largely from the path that was under his feet and so to permit him to stumble into entangling inconsistencies, which might have been avoided if his attention had been more recalled to the practical obligations of the hour." Ab, that is it, exactly! A prophet is a man with a vision of two worlds, and he must always seem fanatical and troublesome and contradictory to the man whose view is too closely limited to one world. Such a man is sure to be cannonaded while he lives and is likely to be canonized when he dies, after the fashion of all zealous saints and reformers.

There were many, however, who canonized Roger Williams while he lived, and there are a few who still keep up the cannonading, now that he has been dead more than 200 years.

With unfeigned reverence for the prophets of the Old Testament and the apostles of the New, I aver my faith that God has been visiting the world in prophets and apostles at frequent intervals from that day to this. Yet, I take the prophets and apostles of Bible days as the standard by which all other prophets are to be judged.

It is as true that Cromwell and Roger Williams and Lincoln were raised up for a purpose as were Isaiah and Paul and John. Isaiah prepared the way for Luther and Lincoln and all subsequent prophets. It would be a poor world indeed if God had not thus visited it since the days of John the Revelator. But all true prophets must acknowledge their allegiance to Jesus the Prophet and anointed King. Let it be remembered, too, that God has never found a perfect man through whom to do his work. If they were capable or could be made capable of accomplishing the one thing for which they were raised up they were accepted and their work was accepted in spite of their foibles and delinquencies. Modern critics of modern prophets would have set Peter aside, but Jesus did not. He bore with him and loved him into shape for the work he was to do, though, judging from what Paul says (Gal. 2:11), Peter seems to have been always amenable to

If history be read in the light of what I have said above, how intensely interesting and spiritually uplifting the study of history becomes. The more I read, the less I am inclined to make any distinction between secular and sacred history. There is a good deal of what might be called secular history in the Bible and a good deal of what may be termed sacred history in the records of America. I just now recall a remark of B. B. Tyler, made at my own table a few months since, to the effect that he had found "Twenty Years in Congress," by James G. Blaine, one of the most religious books he had ever read. To the secular eye all things are secular; to the religious eye all things are religious. If my readers will be patient I will deal more directly with the present stage of the banishment question in my next letter, giving its status up to date, for the Massachusetts general court has been wrestling with that question in this year of our Lord 1900.

Bro. Vernon has saved me the writing of anything concerning Lord Baltimore, except to add that progressive, for that day, as his charter may have been, he did not live to found any kind of state under it, and as late as 1688 the Church of England was established in the Maryland colony and disabilities were imposed on Catholics and Dissenters.

As to the statement that Rhode Island was the last of the states to accept the new constitution, Bancroft's word is as follows: "That state, although it had taken no part in the Federal convention and for a year or more had neglected to attend in Congress, watched without disapprobation the great revolution that was taking place. Neither of the two states [North Carolina and Rhode Island] which lingered behind remonstrated against the establishment of a new government before their consent; nor did they ask the United States to wait for them. The worst that can be said of them is that they were late in arriving." Surely, no serious reflection on Rhode Island is implied in these words.

MEMORY AND OLD AGE.

L. S. CUPP.

Old age is crowned. To place upon a man's head a regal crown is to bestow upon him a nation's highest honor. So God pays to man the highest tribute of this world by placing upon the head of age a crown of silvered hair. This crown, like the royal crown of Britain, is studded with blazing jewels. The most valuable jewel in this costly diadem is memory, the resplendent Kohinoor of age. The young man stands at the opening gates of life, looking forward upon the plains of ambition. But the old man, staff in hand, stands at the opening gates of death, looking backward upon the fields of memory. And what a blessing is a good memory to old age! In its blessed sunshine the old can live over their lives again, for so many things are in the past to which the memory clings, and around which the fancy loves to linger.

An old grandfather sits under an oak. watching his great-grandchildren at play. His form is shriveled and bent with age and care, his eyes are dim, his ears are dull of hearing, his hair white as the winter's driven snow. For a little while he watches the children romp and gambol, like young harts upon the mountains of Bethel; and then his memory, borne away on a ripple of childish laughter, goes rambling backward down the winding path of his life. Once more he is a boy of twelve in his childhood home. His brothers and sisters are there, and they are playing in the back yard together. Mother is in the kitchen preparing the evening meal. Father is sitting on the porch playing with the little sister's golden curls, often looking affectionately towards the other children at play. There is the milkhouse and the cool spring near by it. There is the old swing, in which is a neighbor girl of seven, come home with them from school. He sees himself standing there, his face radiant with boyish laughter, as he sends the old swing high among the spreading branches of the pine from which it hangs. The supper-bell rings and all scamper away to the kitchen and sit down at the table. There is father at the head of the table and mother at the foot, with little golden-haired Mary on one side of her and the little girl neighbor on the other. The brothers and sisters are arranged along either side, restlessly awaiting the signal to begin.

Memory shifts the scene forward a lew months. There is the little church on the hill. It is full of people, and many of them are weeping. Father and mother are there, brothers and sisters are there—all but one. A little white coffin sits before the pulpit, covered with flowers. In that coffin is little Mary with the golden hair. Oh, how empty was the home when they all went back! Father sat on the porch and wept, but the darling little sister was not there. Mother sat in her usual place at the table, but no golden curls beside her. The old man under the tree is weeping now, so memory shifts the scene again.

He sees a crowd of wedding guests assembled, and himself about to be married. He sees himself a tall, robust man of twenty-five, standing before the minister. Beside him is a beautiful figure in white, crowned with carnations and roses, and holding his arm in a trembling embrace. The service ends and they turn away as husband and wife. It is the girl neighbor of seven, now grown to womanhood, that has become his bride.

Then memory whirls the old man rapidly along the path of life. It takes him again on a number of journeys to the little church. Once it was to bury a little girl of his own, then a little boy, then his father, then a brother, then mother, until a long procession of loved ones had gone into the graveyard to return no more. And last of all had g ne his dear, faithful wife, at a ripe old age, and he is left alone. There are the graves, a long line of them, heaped up like billows of green; but here are the memories, the tender, sweet memories of the past. Oh, what a priceless jewel is the memory that adorns the crown of age!

PRES. MILLIGAN'S ADVICE TO YOUNG MINISTERS.

CLAYTON KEITH.

Young Brethren:—In view of your great and increasing responsibilities let me exhort you:

- 1. To see that your own hearts are right in the sight of God. "Keep thy heart with all diligence, for out of it are the issues of life," is one of the most impressive of Solomon's proverbs.
- 2. To cherish in your hearts supreme love to God and an ardent sympathy for suffering, dying humanity. Let your constant aim be to reconcile men to God. All other duties are secondary to this.
- 3. To this end be diligent students of God's Word. Know nothing but Jesus Christ and him crucified. Be familiar with the New Testament—the life and character, the parables and miracles of Christ—as you are with the contents of no other book.
 - 4. Preach the Word faithfully.
- 5. Cultivate an earnest manner in the pulpit. Avoid levity.
- 6. Be courteous to all and in meekness instruct those who oppose you.
- 7. And, in a word, imitate Christ and his apostles.

I have a fear and somewhat gloomy apprehensions for some who have entered upon this career, arising wholly from an experi ence of many years in college life. In order to guard against the evils that beset your pathway, and to keep the flame of Christian love continually burning upon the altar of your own hearts, it is necessary for you to avail yourselves of all the helps God h s furnished. Attend carefully then to all your duties, and see that your influence is always properly directed in the church. Your example will often prevent the occurrence of much that is evil, and secure the accomplishment of much that is good. And what a responsibility rests upon us all, with regard to the non-professing youth to whom you now have free access!

Such were the words of the beloved and lamented president of Kentucky University at the opening of the session of 1866 67. Many of the "young brethren" are still living who, I doubt not, will remember the above outline, and will recall with pleasure the author's gentle and earnest manner when pleading with the young ministers to labor for the highest interests of the cause of Christ.

THE DIVINE PATIENCE.

T. H. BLENUS.

The Apostle Paul speaks of God as "the God of patience." David speaks of him as "slow to anger and great of mercy." It does really seem that humanity basely and wick edly employs the kindness and forbearance of God as an encouragement to live in sin. If God were, as he is sometimes represented, a rigid and inflexible tyrant, visiting his fury upon transgressors for their first offence, then would man tremble before him, and be filled with apprehension at the thought of defying him; but because he is parient and slow to anger, the sinner sports with his laws and tramples upon his authority. The patience of God is an attribute dear to the concerned believing Christian. It is that attribute bearing different names but with the one design in view, that is to abstain from instantly avenging the insults and outrages offered him by rebels, while it seeks to renew to them the offers of pardon, peace and eternal salvation, while encompassing them with undeserved blessing and opportunities to lead them to faith, repentance and obedience. This divine patience is revealed to us in the Scriptures in terms most interesting and most impressive. It is held out as a foundation of hope for the penitent, as an incitement to holiness and victory for the sinner and as a theme of triumph and gratitude for the believing Christian. It is a modification of the divine goodness. While the goodness of the Almighty respects all creation, patience has as its object only the transgressor. Had iniquity never entered the world, goodness would have triumphantly reigned over all the works of God, but patience never could have been exercised. It is the goodness of God which sustains the irrational creation which "hears the young ravens when they cry;" but it is patience which a long time bears with the offences of the rebellious. God does not spare mankind because he is unacquainted with guilt. Every sin, every transgression, every irregular thought, every unholy desire, every improper intention, every criminal word, every neglected duty is seen by God with all its deformity, all its hideusness and all its aggravating circumstances. Every sin, from its first faint blush, from its most incipient conception, and through all the steps of gradual progressive development to its final culmination is "naked and open to him with whom we have to do." God is not deceived by false pretences; note this, ye sounding brass and tinkling cymbal professors, nor can he be cheated by the mockery of mere external observances, for he reads the heart. Our Almighty Father clearly sees the blighting, blasting influence of sin, the ingratitude it displays, the obligations it violates, the love it contemps, the value f that precious blood which it disregards and the eternal fires which it has already kindled. His divine patience is not the result of impotence. Human patience and human forbearance often proceed from cowardice or inability. On the contrary, with God this attribute is so far from indicating impotence that we are taught in the sacred writings that the divine power of God is most illustriously displayed in his exercise of patience, and for this reason the two attributes are in any places jo ned together in such expressiveness as "slow to anger and of great power." "What if God, willing to make his power known, endured with much long suffering the vessels of wrath filled to destruction?" (Rom. 9:22.) The patience of the Lord displays the greatness of his protection in preserving the church in the midst of her enemies. If there had been no Diocletians and no Neros, we should have had but a faint conception of the care with which God watches over his people. His patience glorifies his perfection. All his attributes are displayed in beauty and excellence before all intelligences, but his patience can be manifested only in this world; there can be no exercise of it in heaven, since there will be nothing there to require it; there can be no exercise of it in hell, since there will be nothing but wrath to the vessels of wrath.

THE CRISIS IN CHINA.

WM. REMPRY HUNT.

The Yellow Empire is in rebellion. The situation is full of the gravest possibilites. Current events have indicated as imminent the mightiest overturning and reconstruction that ever shook the foundations of Asia. The luried lights seen behind the storm-cloud on the political horizon have burst all over the empire in unprecedented fury. It is a drama of blood and fire. Never in the history of the world has this far eastern arena of political intrigue and anarchial confusion rivited so much the attention of the civilized world.

The Pekin court is directly responsible for the insurrectionary movement and the war for the extermination of the foreigners. Indirectly the foreign envoys themselves are responsible for the callousness with which the "intelligence department" has been managed and the pitiful way they have been hood winked by Chinese officialdom. The dethronement of the Emperor Kwang Hai and the placing on the throne of the rebel usurper, Prince Tuan's son, was the signal for a general reaction against all reform and progress, actuated by the highest motives and influenced by Western learning the anxious young emperor instituted some radical reforms. It met with bitter opposition from the Manchu princes and anti-foreign governors.

The "Boxers," who are a powerfully organized "volunteer patriotic so iety," are looked to as the political saviors of the state. It enjoys the highest imperial patronage and support. Its origin lies embedded in the low priesthood of Buddhistic and Taoistic clans. It is a bloodthirsty, fanatical, politico-religious sect, which has for its gloomy ideal the "extermination of foreigners and the sweeping a say—out of the open door—of all modern improvements and a return to Chinese isolation any ancient rule." An imperial edict, issued June 21st, ordered the viceroys of all provinces to massacre the foreigners everywhere without delay.

The most alarming element of danger is yet to stagger Christendom. Proclamations are posted in cities and towns everywhere proclaiming a holy war. They call upon the Buddhist world to rise en masse against the Christian armies. Myriads of heavenly hosts are to aid them. These firebrands are thrown into many million peopled provinces and cities already kindled for revolution. Already the atrocities of the "Boxers" have shocked humanity. It is estimated that fifty thousand native Christians have been massacred.

The sufferings of the interior missionaries have been awful. Nameless outrages have been perpetrated upon pure, innocent young women, missionaries from cultured homes in England and America—this, in several instances, before their lives were sacrificed. The facts are revolting in the extreme, and Christian dignity demands that for the sake of the sacred memory of the victims the facts be withheld. The truth about what happened in beleaguered Pekin during the seige by the "Boxers" and the imperial troops is enough to show the utter corruption of Chinese officialdom and to demonstrate their inability to govern their own country.

The program of events in this land of political mystery was well known to the Tsung Li Yamen in China. Like the Empress Dowager and the Manchu princes, they connived at it. The result has paralyzed the civilized world. Had Sir Claude MacDonald made strong and well supported representations to the Foreign Office in London, and United States Minister Conger even stated his own views of the situation to the Washington Government, this reign of terror might have been largely prevented.

In the provinces of Shansi, Honan and Chehkiang the persecution has been most violent and widespread. The Shansi governor is one of the most rabid of all the foreign-hating officials in China, and has been most active in carrying out the orders of the rebel usurper, Prince Tuan, to "massacre all foreigners and destroy all railroads, mines, telegraphs, churches, schools and everything savoring of progress and civilization." The China Inland Mission, with their Swedish associates, had ninety-one missionaries in the province of Shansi, besides those missionaries of the English Baptists and of the American Board. The English Baptist mission reports that fifty of the foreign missionaries have been brutally massacred and the native Christians suffered untold violence. A China Inland Mission party of fourteen escaped from Shansi and some have reached Hankow. Mrs. E. J. Cooper, Miss Rice, Miss Hunter and two children died on the way down. They were beaten, publicly exposed and maltreated by their soldier escort and subjected, before the wild, incestuous crowds, to shameful indignities. The children died of wounds and hunger.

In Chehkiang the brutal murder of Mr. and Mrs. Thompson and other workers was carried out under the very eyes of the officials. The workers have been driven into the plains, confined in filthy dungeons and caves. One party of refugees, together with women and children, ate grass and roots for two days to stay the pangs of hunger and allay the terrible fever thirst.

Shanghai is crowded with refugees. Hotel prices are prohibitive and house rents are very high. Nearly all the missionaries in the Yangtse Valley provinces are being recalled. Some hundreds are even yet supposed to be in hiding in the mountains or under Chinese military protection (?) en route to the coast.

The Japanese Government transports have afforded every facility and shown great kindness and courtery to many refugres from the missions, mines, railroads and telegraph offices in the northern provinces. In this tremendous task of resettling the country (after justice has been meted out to the inhuman and diabolical anti-foreign governors and princes who have obeyed the rebel edicts with the most hellish ferocity) Japan deserves the moral support of every civilized power.

Lord Salisbury's most ill-timed and ill-advised utterances on "Foreign Missions" at the bicentenary meeting of the S P.G., at Exeter Hall, were hailed with jubilation by the Chinese mandarinate. The exceedingly bad taste of the action was taken up with ready voice and pen by the native papers of Shanghai and Tientsin, and it was flaunted again and again in the faces of the foreign missionaries, who had lost home, friends and all in the cause—you are not even "popular at the Foreign Office."

Again, the charge made by England's illustrious statesman, that if the former missionary "faced the difficulties and underwent the martyrdom and braved the torments to which he was ex osed" the result was borne joyfully. "But," he continues, "if such occur to day, the result is an appeal to the Consul and the mission of the gunboat." These statements may be brilliant in generalization, but are indeed dull in fact.

The very society at whose meeting Lord Salisbury uttered his unfortunate criticism quite recently lost three of its agents at the hands of Chinese murderers. There was no cry for vengeance or protection. Is it not a stern fact that twelve hundred agents of the C. M. S. were massacred in cold blood a few years since? There was no cry for vengeance or even compensation! Replying to Lord Salisbury's utterances, Dr. W. Gilbert Walsh says: "As a matter of fact, if the gunboat were requisitioned no wadays, it would be in accordance with the practice of the missions in early days, for it was customary for the missionary traveler to be fortified by letters to the kings and potentates of the kingdoms he had to travel, and overshadowed by the ægis of royalty; whereas, nowadays the Foreign Office exercises its paternal functions by chastising for its own pleasure the representatives of a Christian country who are engaged in furthering its religious, commercial and political interests. I need not adduce evidence in support of this aspect of missionary work. The testimonies of statesmen, Viceroys and merchants might be quoted ad libitum."

Christendom should know that there are both martyrs and victims in China—the first sacrificed to fiendish hate, and the second to Foreign Office neglect and abandonment! "Missionaries and others," says Dr. Walsh, and he writes what he knows, "are murdered as the helpless representatives of 'Powers' which have become contemptible through repeated instances of weakness and vacillation, and they are rendered all the more liable to violence and murder by the known fact that they are not 'popular at the Foreign Office' or its local counterparts."

We do not deny the fact that the army follows the missionary. It is not safe for it to go before him. We do not repudiate that a missionary should, as the Prime Minister insinuates, lose his citizenship from the mere fact that he is a missionary. His right of appeal to the Consul is as well founded surely as that of the rum-seller or the opium merchant, when either are in peril. To discard national rights and protection would be suicide. If there must be, as Lord Salisbury declares, "martyrs in mission fields," then let it so be, but pray do not'let the ill-timed remarks of statesmen and the indifference of our homeland governments become our executioners!

The outlook is dark. Prince Tuan, together with the Empress Dowager and the Emperor Kwang Hsu are reported as having fled by rail to Paotingfu, en route westward to Shansi, where the notorious Yushien is offering them a celebrated Buddhist resort on a high mountain in his province. With them is a large army and priceless treasures in precious stones and gold bars.

This evacuation has left the friendly Yangtse Viceroys, Lin and Chang, the defacto masters of their own territories, and left them the only accredited officials to deal with the settlement with the allies. At this writing a flying column from the capital is already in pursuit of the terror stricken court. It is to be hoped that they will be intercepted, arrested and brought back, and the sternest reparation exacted from them for their heinous crime against civilization and national honor.

At present the allies are acting in alliance. In this is the supreme hope of a permanent settlement. It would be a travesty on civilization and on its religion and morality, should bitter jealousies arise. China is in the death throes of one of the greatest revolutiors of the ages. The oldest and newest civilizations are in violent collision. What is done must be done swiftly or the Chinese problem will, with its massiveness of population, and immensity of empire, tax the wisdom, diplomacy and military resources of the world.

Nanking, China, Aug. 24, 1900.

Our Budget.

- -What noise is that we hear?
- -It is the din of preparation for the great Kansas City Convention.
- -It comes from the surf-beaten shores of the Atlantic, all the way to the golden sands of the Pacific.

It is heard among the pines of the North, the orange groves of the South and yonder in the far North west, "where rolls the Oregon."

-As to Kansas and Nebraska, Missouri and Illinois and others of the more adjacent states, the roar of preparation in their borders is so great that a political band wagon can scarcely be heard, that is, among the people called Christians.

-Read the program elsewhere of the convention of the American Christian Missionary Society-only a part of the feast to be spread-and you will decide to join the procession whose destination is Kansas City, Oct. 12-18.

-An announcement from the dean of the Missouri Bible College, Columbia, states that the work of the current year will be confined mainly to a course of lectures by a number of well-known scholars who are distinguished in their respective spheres. The list of these lectures is not complete and the names will be announced as soon as it is completed.

-C. C. Redgrave, of Maroa, Ill., who attended the Missouri convention at Moberly, and presented an outline of his lectures, has made a number of engagements in Missouri to deliver the same. His purpose in these lectures is largely missionary and we hope the brethren will assist him wherever possible in his worthy enterprise.

-C. H. White, Galesburg, Ill., is excursion manager to the Kansas City Convention for the Third Illinois Missionary district.

-We learn that Christian College, Columbia, Mo., has opened with the largest enrollment in its history, which demonstrates what its managers believed, that there is a demand for a high-grade institution for young women in the West.

-The church at Monongahela, Pennsylvania, C. S. Reel, pastor, dedicated a new house of worship on Lord's day, September 23. Hitherto the church has been worshiping in a hall over a store. Brother Reed is a Missouri preacher who has drifted East; but we have an intimation that if the current should set in strong enough, he might be made to drift back to Missouri again.

-We call attention to the timely article on "The Crisis in China," by Wm. Remfry Hunt, missionary in Nanking, China, which appears in this issue. No class of men, in our judgment, have so clear an insight into the real causes of China's present condition as the missionaries. They have given more study to its languages, its literature, its religions, its needs, than any other class of people. It may be thought that our correspondent unjustly criticises the foreign ministers for not letting their governments know fully the events preceding and surely prophesying the outrages perpetrated upon the foreigners. But we call the attention of our readers to the fact that we published extracts from a personal letter from Timothy Richard, president of the Society for the Diffusion of Knowledge in China, in which he predicted this outbreak, and referred to his visit to the Secretary of State to have something done for the protection of Chinese reformers and the converts. The criticism of Lord Salisbury's utterance on the subject is entirely just and ex ceedingly moderate considering the provocation. The men who have done most to better the condition of China have received the least consideration and the most injustice in all this agitation.

-Daughters College has had a gratifying opening and President Jones is making an appeal to the friends of the college to contribute towards the wiping out of the indebtedness on the institution. He is organizing a "One Dollar Brigade" which he asks all the friends of the institution to join. It is to be remembered that the name of this institution at Fulton, Missouri, was changed from that of the "Christian Female Orphans' School of Missouri," to "Daughters College." It is still educating a number of orphans each year. however, and on this ground makes its appeal to the public. We wish the school success in this financial enterprise.

-Joel W. Jones, of the city, a pioneer Disciple of Christ, died at the home of his daughter, Mrs. Beach, on last Saturday, in his 84th year. The funeral services were held in his daughter's residence and conducted by Dr. D. R. Dungan, of Canton, Mo. Brother Jones knew well the fathers of the Restoration movement. Some one will doubtless prepare a suitable obituary for our col-

-In this number will be found the program of the Convention of the American Christian Missionary Society. A careful perusal of it will furnish all the reasons necessary to convince you that you ought to be in Kansas City between the dates which it covers. The address of President E. Benjamin Andrews, of the Nebraska University, on "The Place of the Church College in the American System of Education," will be an able discussion of a timely topic. But this is only one among many striking features of the program.

-Dr. W. T. Moore, dean of the Bible College, Columbia, Mo., announces in a neat circular which we have received, that he has decided to enter the lecture field and is prepared to visit churches, chautauquas, Y. M. C. A.'s or other societies in any of the states, and deliver lectures on a list of subjects contained in the circular. One series of subjects is on "Old and New Testament Studies," and embraces twenty-four lectures. Another is a series of popular lectures numbering twelve. Following is a list of these topics:

Are Two and Two Four?

John Bull in his Castle.

How to Assure Success.

The Religious Plea of the Disciples: Does it Meet the Demands of the New Testament and of the times?

The Christian Union Movement up to date. What is the Most Dangerous Imperialism of 6. modern times Tent life in Palestine.

The Ethics of Wealth.

Christ and the People.

The Twentieth Century a forecast. 11.

The Gospel of Modern Literature The Educational Problem and How to Solve 12.

And there is a Special Course designed to be helpful in the development of a true church life.

This also consists of twelve lectures embracing such topics as "The Kind of Preaching Needed," "Evangelistic Methods," "Pleafor a New Reformation," "How to Make every Member of a Church Count," "Church Discipline-Pastor and Flock," "Family-State and Church," "Foundation Principles in the Christian Life," "The Stairway that Leads to Heaven," etc. There is also a course of Character Sketches covering twelve distinguished men: Alexander Campbell, Charles Haddon Spurgeon, William Ewart Gladstone, Abraham Lincoln, Isaac Errett, Alfred Tennyson, James Russell Lowell, Count Tolstoy, John Ruskin, Victor Hugo, Prince Bismarck, Neal Dow. Here is a wide range of topics and their discussion by one of the wide experience, travel and literary ability of Dr. Moore cannot but prove stimulating and helpful to churches, societies and other organizations securing them. We trust that he may be kept busy in this new field of usefulness.

-Special Dispatch to the Ohristian-Evangelist: CINCINNATI, Oct. 1 .- Receipts for Foreign Missions reach one hundred and eighty thousand dol-F. M. RAINS

-The church in Tuxedo near this city, D. N. Gillett, pastor, has recently raised over $200 toward paying off its indebtedness. This courch is a beneficiary of the Church Extension fund and is reducing its loan as rapidly as possible.

-The books of the Foreign Society closed for the missionary year showing receipts amounting to $179,406.94, or a gain of $26,679.36. The churches and friends of Foreign Missions are to be congratulated upon the increased interest and liberality revealed by these encouraging figures.

-During the month of September the Foreign Society was remembered by five friends with gifts on the annuity plan, aggregating $2,500. The whole amount in this fund now is $92,240. Other friends are considering gifts. May the number

-Under date of Sept. 29, 1900, G. W. Muckley, Corresponding Secretary of Church Extension work, writes as follows: "We passed the $250,000 mark to-day, with $2,129 to spare. Our new re ceipts for the year are $57,118.28 including in terest. Let us praise the Lord for the most successful year's work in the history of Church Extension. There will be a supplementary report made of all receipts coming in between the first and fifteenth of October, at which time our annual report is read. Let delinquent churches report at once. Our new watchword, 'A HALF MILLION BY 1905.' There will be much rejoicing at this bit of good news throughout the land. It means much for the houseless churches.

-In the published program of the Foreign Christian Missionary Society for the Kansas City Convention, the name of Albert Baxton appears as Albert Judson. This transformation was wrought out in the type room and escaped notice until in the paper. It is Dr. Albert Buxton that is to deliver the address on "Adoniram Judson," at Kansas City, Oct. 17, at 3:50 P. M.

W. E. Harlow, of Parsons, Kansas, is to assist E. T. McFarland, pastor of the Fourth Christian Church of this city, in a protracted meeting beginning October 7th. The Fourth Church is lo cated in a great field for missionary and evangelistic work and we hope that these brethren will be abundantly blessed in their effort. They are earnest, efficient men of God and the church is an active, wide-a sake church. They have determined on a new and larger house of worship to cost $8,000, and have their plans already executed. Their present house is entirely too small for their work. We sincerely hope that God will bless these brethren in their meeting and the church in its work.

-There is no excuse for blind children in the state of Missouri growing up without an education. The school in St. Louis is supported by the state for their benefit and no false notions should deter any one who stands in need of its ministry from an education. It is not an "asylum for the blind," but a school wherein the blind are capacitated for self-support. The only expense to the student is clothing and traveling expenses to and from the school. Applicants for admission, however, must be of good mental and physical capacity. Those who are feeble-minded or who suffer such physical deformity or weakness as to necessitate special care, are not admitted None are received under the age of nine years, and while applicants are sometimes admitted as old as twentyfour, they should be much younger. The school being supported by the state, none but bons fide residents are admitted. For further information address Jas. C. Jones, Secretary, St. Louis, Mo.

-With this issue we begin a most interesting es of articles on Bible Study. The article this k is by H. L. Willett, of Chicago, and cannot of interest to every Bible reader. This article o be followed by other equally interesting cles by able writers. These articles will whet appetite for Bible reading and study and ngly emphasize the excellent work now being by the Bethany C. E. Reading Course manment. You can do a good missionary work by mmending these articles to the attention of ers who would be likely to enjoy them.

-Geo. F. Hall, of Chicago, is to deliver e lectures under the auspices of the Central artment of the Y. M. C. A, of this city, as ows: October 7th, Sunday evening, 7 o'clock, e Greatest Book in the World" (to men). October 8th, 8 P. M. "The Model New nan" (a popular lecture). October 9th,
. M., "America in the 20th Century" (also a alar lecture). The admission to each of these ures will be free and the available space in the torium ought to be occupied each night. It is opening of the Y. M. C. A. campaign in this city the attendance will be large. Geo. F. Hall is located in Chicago, 508 Eddy St., and will ote all his time to lecturing and preaching as ortunity presents itself. He is open to calls where in the United States. He expects to Sunday afternoon services in the auditorium winter.

-We publish in another place an article end "Our Twentieth Century Fund," which is an eal for an endowment for the Widows' and Orns' Home at Louisville, Ky. The cause is one will appeal to Christian people generally. The k of benevolence needs much more emphasis ng us than it has received. It is greatly to be red that all our Homes and other benevolent itutions shall be brought under one general em of benevolence under the general supervisof a board in which the brotherhood at large ald be represented, but under which each parlar institution shall have its own local managet as now. This would give unity to our benevt work, as we are trying to bring about unity ur educational and missionary work. Plans, believe, are being prepared by which this end be realized.

-J. W. Ingram, now temporarily sojourning at sas City and recuperating his health, sends us e "Sunday Night Musings" in which he speaks wo helpful sermons which he had heard during day. One of them from T. P. Haley in the ingfield Avenue Church, which he characterizes 'a strong *ppeal by a strong man to the people, out their trust in God and go forward." Con-ning the preacher he says: "The life and labors such a man furnish many inspiring lessons for younger preachers of the gospel. What an stimable blessing such an one is to a city or munity where God has called him to live and or!" In the evening he heard a sermon at the spect and 22nd Street Church from Brother llips, of Augusta, Georgia, who with his acplished wife, was paying a visit to his old rch. Mrs. Phillips is the daughter of Brother r of that congregation, whom Brother Ingram baptized several years ago. Brother Ingram was greatly strengthened by the sermon of the eloquent young preacher, and referring to a prayer by Brother Kerr, who "prayed so feelingly for the man who led him to the cross and into the light," he was able to realize the reward to which Jesus referred when he said, "In this world an hundredfold," etc. "After a continued pastorate of forty years," Brother Ingram writes, "I have been forced by illness to give up active pulpit service for three months, and during that time have been in the business world. I want to say the encouragement of my preaching brethren, I would rather be a doorkeeper in the house of my God, than to dwell in the tents of wealth forever. I do believe I would rather live on bread and water, and preach the mighty gospel of God, than to engage in secular labor and fair sumptuously." This is the true spirit for a minister of the gospel, and we sincerely trust that Brother Ingram will soon be able to resume his labors in the ministry.

-The editor spent Lord's day last in Indianapolis, attending the Central Christian Church, A. B. Philputt, pastor, in the morning and the Third Church, C. C. Rowlison, pastor, in the evening. We were greatly pleased, not only with the sermons we heard, but with the orderly, impressive services throughout, and the spirit of worship which pervaded all. We were glad to learn that all our churches in the city are working harmoniously and are being prospered of the Lord. It was a great pleasure to greet many old friends while at Indianapolis.

-The following special dispatch to the Republic of this city may prove of interest to many of our readers, referring as it does to the marriage of one of the members of our staff:

Indianapolis, Ind., Oct. 1.—The marriage of Miss Annie Gsines Dye, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. John T. Dye of this city, and Mr. Winfred Ernest Garrison, of St. Louis, took place here to-night. The ceremony was witnessed by the immediate relatives and a few friends. A reception followed at the Dye home. The marriage altar was built of green and white in the second parlor. There was a canopy of asparagus fern and smilax with a bell of bride roses and white carnations. On either side were palms and foliage plants, amid which burned two tall altar cardles in Russian Cathedral holders. The orchestra played Grieg's "Norwegian Wedding March" as Indianapolis, Ind., Oct. 1 .- The marriage of age plants, and which ourned two tall attar candles in Russian Cathedral holders. The orchestra played Grieg's "Norwegian Wedding March" as the bridal party entered. The officiating clergy man was the bridegroom's father, the Reverend Doctor J. H. Garrison, of St. Louis.

The flowers were carried before the bride and her attendant by John T. Dye, Jr., and Judith Garrison, the latter the young daughter of Mr. and Mrs. A. O. Garrison, of St. Louis. The bride wore a gown of heavy white satin. The corsage was finished with a bertha of duchess lace and a yoke of shirred tucked moline. Her veil was fastened with orange blossoms and she carried bride roses. The wedding supper followed congratula-tions, the dining room being decorated in Amer-ican beauty roses. The parlor was decorated with France roses. Assisting in entertaining at the reception were Doctor and Mrs. J. H. Garrison, of St. Louis. After the bridal tour, Mr. and Mrs. Garrison will reside in St. Louis, where Mr. Garrison is assistant editor of the CHRISTIAN-EVAN-

The entire force in this establishment extends hearty congratulations to the newly-wedded pair. After a brief sojourn in the North, they return to St. Louis, their future home.

-At the preachers' meeting held in this office on last Monday the following additions were reported: First Church, four; Second, one; Fourth, one baptism; Ellendale, ten since last report; Beulab, two confessions; Mt. -Our staunch Presbyterian contemporary of Cincinnati, the Herald and Presbyter, replying to some criticisms against the doctrine of election as held by that Church, says:

Calvinism is not narrow in its ideas. Its faith to the number of the saved is as wide as the electing love of God, and it believes that every soul that will stand on the right hand on the day of judgment will be the elect of God. Is there anything narrow in that? Where is there any faith that is wider?

It is not the narrowness of Calvinism, Brother H. and P., that is objected to, but its unscriptural view of election. Calvinism makes it the arbitrary act of God, based on His divine sovereignty. without any relation to the faith or moral condition of persons so elected; whereas the New Testament makes it depend upon the faith and obedience of those who are called by the gospel. It is this lack of harmony between the election of John Calvin and the election of the New Testament, that has created the demand for a revision of the Westminster Confession of Faith, and there will be no stopping of this agitation short of such a revision of that Confession as will give a human being some opportunity for the exercise of his volition in the matter of his election.

A. J. Marshall.

The picture on our first page this week is that of our city evangelist of St. Louis, A. J. Marshall. Bro. Marshall has had a varied experience as farmer, soldier, student, missionary, college professor, editor, pastor and evangelist. His early life was spent on a farm in Southern Wisconsin. He became a Christian at the age of 15, uniting with the Baptist Church, of which his parents were members. He served in the United States army eighteen months. At the close of the war he attended Hillsdale College, Michigan, where he graduated, receiving the degree of B. D., and later of A. M. He married Miss Emily L. Phillips soon after graduating. His wife was the daughter of a missionary in India, and he sailed as a missionary in the autunm of 1873 and served for nine years in that land, being compelled to discontinue on account of the condition of his health. Afterwards he took charge of Rochester Seminary, Wisconsin, and later became editor of a western paper published in Minneapolis. It was while recuperating his health in Iowa that he became acquainted with the Disciples of Christ and with his whole congregation came into the Reformation. While still serving in Iowa he was called to be city evangelist by the Christian Churches in this city, in which capacity he has labored with good success, being now in his second year. He is to discuss the subject of "City Evangelization" in the forth-coming Kansas City Convention.

Dersonal Mention.

David G. Husband, late of Minnesota, has located with the church at Waitsburg, Wash. He writes that his new work begins an piciously and encouragingly.

The close of Bro. F. D. Powers' twenty-five years' pastorate in Washington City was celebrated at the Vermont Avenue Christiaa Church, Sept. 50th, with appropriate services.

J. W. Marshell, of Taylor, Tex., called at this office on last Friday on his way to Stilletto, Ind., at which point he is now engaged in a protra ted meeting. We are glad of this new personal acquaintance with Bro. Marshall.

After five years of service with the church in Blackstons, Va, JC. Reynolds has resigned, much to the regret of the congregation. And as an expression of their regret suitable resolutions were adopted by the congregation.

A. J. Crockett, of New Sharon, Iowa, writes that afte a vacation of ten months his health seems to be permanently restored. He began his second pastorate with the church in New Sharon Sept. 2nd.

Leroy Henry, M. D., Terre Haute, Ind., has an eight-page tract on "Some Social and Economic Teachings of Jesus" that is worthy of a considerate reading. It will help one to realize how much more deeply the sayings of Jesus penetrated the conditions of his day than we ordinarily think.

A young man, unmarried, graduate of Bethany College and of good character, desires to locate as pastor at moderate salary. One year's experience. Persons wishing to inquire may write to C. G. McNeill. 670 33rd St., Milwaukee, Wis. Enclose stamp.

On the evening of the 23d inst. Bro. C. M. Schoonover, one of the brightest young men of the Christian Church, was set apart to the ministry of the gospel of Christ by the church at Windsor, Mo., assisted by J. J. Lockhart, of Canton, Mo. Bro. Schoonover has recently been called to the church at Windsor and every one speaks highly of his ability as a preacher He formerly labored in We give him a cordial welcome to Missouri.

W. M Hollett has resigned his pastorate in Arlington, Is., and accepted a call to Perry, Okla homa, where he goes at once. Bro. Hollett has been with the church in Arlington for six years and has greatly endeared himself to the people of that town by his extended services. The church in Arlington will miss such a man and Bro. H. will miss such a church. The regrets are mutual. Applicants for the Arlington pulpit are requisted to address D. B. Allen, enclosing credentials and stamp for reply.

J.O. Carson, of this city, has just returned from an outing in Canada. He was up on the Nepigon River and seems to have discovered a new and undisturbed fishing ground. He reports having caught speckled trout weighing from four to eight pounds. He was the champion fisher of the crowd, having caught a speckled trout that weighed over eight pounds. He enjoyed the trip and returns greatly refreshed and invigorated.
When he goes again he may find it difficult to keep his crowd within its former bounds.

G. E. Williams, one of our promising young preachers, a student of Christian University, Canton, Mo, was married at Wythe Church, near Warsaw Hancock county, III., on Sunday evening, Sept. 10th, 1900, to Miss May Ayers. Bro. Williams preached at Wythe Church, of which Miss Ayers was a member, he having baptized her about a year ago. The ceremony was performed in the presence of a large audience by Paul H. Caetle, of Virden, Ill., an old friend and college mate of the groom Bro. Williams and his bride went to (anton the same evening, where he will continue his college course.

W. E. Boulton, of Mound City, Mo., closes his term of services with the Mound City church, Dec. 31. Duri g his work there, there have been 17 baptisms and a debt of $760 on the church building, in addition to other old d-bts, has been raised. This church contributed for missions last year almost twice the amount of any former year. On the third Sunday of each month Bro. Boulton has driven from 22 to 24 miles and preached three times, besides preaching most of the time in the afternoons of the second and fourth Sundays 32 miles in the country. In changing his location he is willing to work where his services will accomplish the most good.

F. M. Green, Kent. Ohio, is now for the first time during a long ministry without any definite charge, and would like to correspond with churches whice need his services. Bro Green is too widely and favorably known as a wise teacher and preacher of the gospel to need any word of commendation from us. He should be kept in the harness as long as he is able to render efficient service.

A Valuable Sunday school Help.

The attention of all our Sunday-, chool workers is again called to our special offer of the "Map of the Travels of Jesus." For the next nine months. until July, 1901, the International Sunday-school lessons will continue on the life of Jesus. Such a map as this is an indispensable aid in properly and adequately studying or teaching these Lessons. The map indicates every spot visited by our Lord. By means of colored lines, showing his itinerary and the chronol gical tables which form a part of the map, every movement of Jesus can be followed, from his birth at Bethlehem to the crucifixion on Calvary.

The regular price of this map has always been $5. Some time ago we came into possession of several hundred copies at a price somewhat lower than the usual wholesale figure, and during the summer we have been selling it for Three Dollars -an exceedingly low price for such a map. We yet have some copies on hand, which, while they last, may be had at the reduced price. is six feet long by three feet wide. It is varnished and mounted on cloth, so that it will last many years. It is furnished with rollers, all ready to hang up. Orders should be sent at once to Golden Wedding.

August 27, 1850, Miss Sarah Ransom and Jackson D. Vandervoort were united in holy matrimony at the bride's home on Grand Island, Niagara County, N. Y. August 27, 1900, about 150 of the relatives and friends of Mr. and Mrs. Vandervoort assembled at their beautiful home in North Tonawanda, N. Y., just across the Niagara River from where they were married, and cele brated the golden anxiversary of the aforesaid wedding It was a happy occasion. No families in Western New York are held in greater esteem than the Ransom and Vandervoort families. This was evidenced by the many presents, as well as by large attendance. Asa Ransom, the father of Mrs. Vandervoort, was a charter member of the old Clarence (N. Y.) Church o' Christ, one of the oldest in the state. Mrs. Vandervoort has been a member of the Church of Christ for 57 years, and Mr. Vandervoort for 48 years. Mrs. Vandervoort served several terms as treasurer of the Haven's Home, of East Aurora, N. Y., a benevolent institution for aged Disciples, owned and managed by the New York Christian Missionary Society Mr. and Mrs. Vanderv ort have been blessed with Mrs. Vanderv ort have been blessed with five children, four of whom are living. A Missionary in Distress.

TO THE DISCIPLES OF CHRIST IN IOWA: -Some years ago Bro. M. Baghdassarian, an Armenian of fice education and strong Christian character, cane to Drake University to be educated in the Bible College. He soon won the confidence and the esteem of the faculty, the Discipes in Des Moines, and eventually in the whole sate After two years of study he was sent to Persia, to work aming Armenian refugies. For five years he has met with great discouragements and almost unvarying failure, through no fault of his own Before he was sent out he secured pledges aggregating one thousand dollars per year for three years. Many of these pledges were not collected, but from time to time sums of money have been sent him, barely sufficient for existence. The famine that has been raging for two or three years has made his efforts fruitless. His condition and that of his family is critical. For conscience' sake, for the love of humanity, and for the live of Christ, sufficient money must be raised to enable him to remove his family to some European port, or back to America. We cannot honorably close this unfortunate chapter in mission work without so doing. The following letter from the Vice Consul General at Teheran, Persia, explains the circumstance:

Legation of the Uni'ed States of America, Teheran, Persia, August 6, 1900. The Rev. H. O. Breeden, D D.,

FACTS ABOUT CHINA.

We recently published a booklet, entitled "Facts About China," by Wm. Remfrey Hunt, of Che Cheo, China. Mr. Hunt has been for many years a resident of Central China, and is thoroughly acquainted with the country and its people. The following are some of his topics:

History and Age of China, The People of China, Populousness of China, Climate and Products,

Vastness of Chinese Empire, Classic and Sacred Systems, Strange Manners and Customs, Some Absurdities of Heathenism, Lauguage, Education and Literature, Missions in China.

"Facts About China" is concisely and tersely written. The purpose of the author is to convey information and to instruct and not to entertain or amuse. Nevertheless, the book is thoroughly interesting. A map of the Chinese Empire is included in the book.

country and consequently every article of diet has been at semi-famine prices; and I can well understand that a family without any visible means of support must be in a discressed condition.

I am not aware of the terms of his service under this society, and, consequently, cannot make any suggestion regarding the amelioration of his position, except either to remove him to some other field of lacor, or send him on to America or to his home in Turkey. He has, however, a great objection to returning to Turkey as a subject of that state; and as it is somewhat doubtful if he would be allowed, as a naturalized citizen of the United States, to re-enter Turkey, the only alternative, it appears, would be to remove him to some other sphere of work or bring him back to the United States.

If there is anything I can do to facilitate the carrying cut of any proposal you may have to make, I am at your service. Yours very stacerely,

JOHN TYLER, Vice Consul General.

Every consideration of justice and humanity, much less of Christianity, prompts us to send him relief instantly. On condition that $400 is raised th- Central Church of Des Moines will give $100, leaving $300 for all the churches and Disciples of the state. Let our brethren everywhere respond quickly to this appeal, or the missionary may be past help before funds reach him. If the first opportunity after reading this, all our ministers in the state will make an appeal for cash or pledges to their congregations and send the result to W. W. [This is a righteous movement, and one that perhaps ought to have been made earlier, but there is all the greater reason for promptly responding to this appeal. The remaining sum of $300 ought to be subscribed at once and cabled to this good brother whose destitute condition will appeal to every generous heart. While this appeal is specially directed to Iowa Disciples and while the responsibility for Bro. Annual Meeting in China,

Our meeting this year was first set for July and at Kuling, where most of the members of the mission have been going for the heated term for several years. But the "Boxers" ordained it otherwise, so having fled (at the orders of our consuls) to Shanghai, the annual conference was there held. one week later than the presrranged date. This was not the only untoward event. Dr. Daisy Macklin and Dr. H. G. Welpton had both just left for America under medical orders, and in such precarious health that we feared we should not see them on the field again.

One family was in Japan. However, nothing daunted, the sixteen remaining ones proceed d to hold what may be termed a very successful series of meetings. Under the circumstances it was wisely decided to omit some of the stated papers and addresses. The most gratifying news was that the number of converts was much larger than ever before-184. Eighty-six of these were from Chu Cheo, where there seems to have been an old-fashioned revival in progress for some time. Another good feature was the goodly sum of money from all sources on the field, that went into the work, namely, $2,960.25 (mex). Notwithstanding the trying circumstances surrounding us, we did not hear a murmur nor a note of discouragement. Every report was full of hope and praise. Perhaps the titles of some of the papers read would be interesting.

"What Shall We Require of Members in Regard to Keeping the Lord's Day?"-Miss Kelly.

"How Much and in What Way Shall we Help the Chinese Poor, Especially Christians?"-E. J. Osgood.

"Itineration"-W. R. Hunt.

"Shall we Shield our Members from Persecution? If so, How, When, to What Extent?"-J. Butchart.

Much thankfulness was felt that our mission had thus far escaped danger and hurt, although grievous harm had befallen so many missionaries in various parts of China.

These are the dark days in the Middle Kingdom. The prince of darkness has great power. The spirit of evil and persecution is rampant. The empire is in the throes of a rebirth. It is the greatest crisis in China's history. In fact, it is a world-crisis. We only wait now, with bated breath, to see the outcome. We want to see a new China, led by honest and able men, and following after peace and righteousness. It is for the purpose of establi hing this reign of righteousness that we have come to this benighted land. God grant us success in seeing his kingdom come among the millions of this empire. W. B. ALL AMONG THE BARLEY.

"Come out, 'tis now September, the hunter's moon's begun," as says a fine old English song. This is the most delightful season of all the year in England. We English people are favored with the finest climate, as well as the best abused climate in the world. There is one thing which our good and welcome American visitors never fail to repeat. They sit at our tables and entertain us with most interesting descriptions of America and invariably glide into profane language about our poor English climate. They tell us that we have no climate at all. We have only little choppy and scrappy samples of all the other climates on earth. They think England is the meteorological inferno of this cosmos. But once I was surprised to hear an American lady say that our summers were de lightful. And I have heard a number of Americans who have long resided in this country declare that there is no other part of the world where it is possible to work comfortably all the year round for so many hours a day. I admit our atmospheric poverty. There are some stupendous commodities which I must warn all intending visitors that they must be contented to dispense with on coming here. We never have a cyclone. Not a single blizzard ever blasted an acre of our soil. There are no earthquakes in our history. Occasionally, about once a century, a slight subterranean tremble has been felt, and in Essex an old church steeple was slightly cracked. But seismological shocks are not in our line. We are negected by old Afolos, the god of the winds, who seems to hold our little island in too condign a degree of contempt to favor it with a tornado or simcom. Insects are of the most innocuous sort. Mosquitos forget how to bite here, and of snakes we have but one species that is hurtful and that is a rare curiosity. We are now in the midst of harvest and all the land is a lovely sight, with the wheat and barley fields ripened and waving the banners of gold at the feet of the hills. The apple orchards of Hereford, Worcester and Devon are Elysian visions, and nothing I know of is more encharting than to travel down from London by way of Canterbury, through Kent to Dover, passing through the hop plantations, where the thousands of pickers, clad in variegated garments, are just now enjoying a delightful and healthy occupation, to which they look forward throughout the year. This year England is glutted with fruit. It is a time of harvest plenty. But alas! all will be needed by our millions of poor people, for vast treasures are being poured forth daily to meet the expenditure of the South African war.

THOMAS SPURGEON.

The son and successor of the great C. H. Spurgeon is about to open the newly constructed Metropolitan Tabernacle. This inauguration will be the great religious event of the coming week. My American readers will remember that the geat tabernacle, which is the cathedral of London Nonconformity, was burned down two years ago. The walls were left standing entire, but the rest of the magnificent structure was totally destroyed. The new tabernacle will be somewhat smaller than the old. It is not so long by about twenty feet, but it will be much more compact a d convenient. It is a satisfaction to all Christian Englishmen and to a vast number of Christian Americans that the ministry of the beloved Charles Haddon Spurgeon is to be continued lineally by his son in the same building, though the catastrophe has involved reconstruction. I have been receiving from Pastor Thomas Spurgeon some interesting personal particulars of himself. As I have known him from his boyhood, most of the details were more or less familiar to myself; but I should like to communicate a few ef them to those who are pleased to learn about noted personalities. Let it be noted that, although Thomas Spurgeon does not claim to rival his father in commanding talent, yet he is not only an exceedingly able man and a most worthy successor, but one of the most familiar and esteemed of London's public men. He is one of the twin sons, the only two children of Mr. and Mrs. C. H. Spurgeon. The other son is the well-known minister of the great Baptist Church at Greenwich. As preachers these two are equally famous. Their services are sought for all over the land. They were born at that lovely villa in Nightingale Lane, Chapman Common, where it was my privilege, like that of some other favored students, sometimes to visit the renowned preacher. The two boys were sent to school for a few years at Brighton. After schooling was over, young Thomas began to study art at South Kensington and wood engraving in Fleet Street. His health became shaky and in 1877 he went to Australia; but his mother's serious illness brought him home in the following year. She was better when he arrived, but Mr. Spurgeon was very ill and his son Thomas was privileged to preach for him and then to accompany him to Mentone for three months. He next attended classes at the Pastors' College for a time, but failing health again took him to the amipodes in 1879. After traveling and preaching in most of the Australian colonies, Mr. Thomas Spurgeon accepted the pastorate of the Baptist Church in Auckland, New Zesland, in 1881. In 1884 the Auckland tabernacle was opened, free of debt. In 1889 he became the evargelist of the Baptist Association of New Zealand, and in that capacity visited all the churches. In 1893 he began to minister in London at the Metropolitan Tabernacle, though for some nine months he was not actually the pastor. It will be remembered that the congregation was very much agitated for a time by the proposition that Dr. Pierson, of America, should become pastor. I have been putting a question or two to Mr. Thomas Spurgeon. I wanted to know whether he was optimistic or otherwise in regard to the general religious and social outlook. His reply was: "I cannot say that I think the outlook bright, and the worst of it is that so many think it is."

C. H. SPURGEON'S INFLUENCE.

I was anxious to obtain from Mr. Thomas Spurgeon a correct idea of the extent to which C. H. Spurgeon's mighty influence survives. In these bustling and mercurial days impressions soon fade. Men are quickly forgotten. Few Englishmen have much to say about Gladstone or Beaconsfield, though these were both popular idols not long ago. I noticed when in America that very few people had anything to say about Lincoln or Garfield. Thomas Spurgeon said to me: "The fact that the great cost of rebuilding the tabernacle has been met is proof positive that C. H. Spurgeon is not forgotten. I believe it is mainly for his sake. The Institutions are well remembered. I could wish for a more liberal interest in the college and the Colportage Association, though, in the providence of God, we have wanted for nothing and no work has been given up." Thomas Spurgeon was born Sept. 20, 1856. When living in New Zealand he married the eldest daughter of Gideon Rutherford, of Dunedin, in 1888. He is now in the very prime of life. His style is not at all eloquent, but is simple and direct His theological accent is an exact replica of his father's, and thus whatever originality characterizes his preaching belongs only to a somewhat poetical turn of mind and to his passionate love of the sea and of nature in all her moods. He has traveled much, and is a man of greatly enlarged sympathies excepting theologically.

SOME LITERARY QUARRELS.

Some nice little troubles are occurring in the London literary world between famous people. One of these is between certain play-writers who are battling about plagiarism, of which one accuses the other. In this I am not interested, as I am not a theater-goer. But there is a curious interest attaching to the dispute between Marie Corelli and Hall Caine. One of the most sensational books of last year was Mr. Hall Caine's "The Christian." Now Miss Corelli has issued a romance with the title "The Master Christian." She is of course accused by some critics of having yielded to the suggestiveness of Mr. Hall Caine's title. This she indignantly denies. Now, as robody can settle the point in dispute, people are turning to the merits of Miss Corelli's book itself. We have been assured beforehand by the publishers that it would prove to be the most remarkable book of the century. An extraordinary production it is, and it is at once bewildering its readers by the mixed feelings it evckes. It is, like all Miss Corelli's writings, turgid with a constant cataract of nolsy rhetoric. Many of the passages are extremely beautiful, and the descriptive pages are often inimitably vivid. But this racketty eloquence makes all her books tiresome for busy people, who after all do not want to be swamped and carried by a Niagara of overwhelming gush. The characters are drawn for a purpose and that purpose is a very strong one, strongly worked out. The book is a tremendous hit at priestcraft and also at a divided Christianity. In this respect it is the great literary surp ise of the day. I must do Miss Corelli the justice she deserves. She has produced her finest book and I recommend all my readers to procure it. I recommend them at the same time to skip pages most generously. I certainly never expected that Marie Corelli would ever write a book which indirectly tells in our favor as a people. Neither do I suppose she herself knows anything of simple apostolic Christianity. She writes better than she is aware and may fulfill a far higher aim than that of which she is conscious. "Red Cheeks."

"OTHER CHILDREN HAVE, WHY NOT YOURS?"

The above comments occur in a letter referring to proper selection of food, from E. J. Wilson, 342 Hemlock St., Allegheny, Pa. "When our first baby boy reached seven months, he began to lose strength and grow pale. He could not digest any of the ordinary baby feeds or prepared milk.

"Acting on the advice of a sister-in-law who was bringing the roses to the cheeks of her two children, by their diet of Grape-Nuts food, my wife purchased a package and began feeding it gradually to our baby, preparing it with a little hot water until it was the consistency of a thick gruel. She not only fed it to the baby but herself began eating it three times a day.

"The transformation was wonderful. Within a month the baby was free from all stomach trouble and my wife's strength was completely renewed, that feeling of fatigue having entirely disappeared. Do not over feed when giving Grape-Nuts food to the baby. Other children have red cheeks, why not yours?"

This food is concentrated and requires less in volume than any food known. Its delicious taste wins friends and the remarkable effects win the reason of any thoughtful person. It was originally prepared for brain workers, but the effect upon the nerve centres and brain is so valuable that it can be used with even nursing babes, to their very great advantage.

The Edge of the Orient.

There is no special reason why the ordinary traveler should stop at Odessa, but it is a very pleasant place in which to spend a few days if you are forced to, as I was, by the combined perversity of Russian passport regulations and steamer schedules. It is a city which belongs thoroughly to western Europe. There is nothing Russian in its appearance except the fact that it has wide streets. It is probably the only city in Russia which is built chiefly of stone. British capital and enterprise are largely responsible for its present prosperity, and the sailors of all nations are to be seen in its streets.

The city is bailt on a high plateau which rises almost abruptly from the sea as the Plymouth Hoe and much higher. At the foot of the cliff are the docks and the dwellings of the sailors and roustabouts, both permanent and transient, and along the cliff at the top runs a broad boulevard and promenade shaded by rows of acacia trees. The best hotels are on this boulevard, and the best thing about them is their glorious outlook over the busy harbor of Odessa and the Black Sea. The harbor was more than usually busy now, for troopships stood there ready to start for China with thousands of Russian soldiers. The last night I was in Odessa there was a grand celebration in my hotel in honor of some officers who were leaving the next day for the front. They made speeches and drank toasts and cheered each other heartily, but they did not sing as German soldiers would have done.

There is an open-air cafe on the boulevard very Parisian in type, where an excellent band plays every afternoon and evening, which furnishes the basis, apparently, for the chief line of social demarkation in the city. If you are somebody, you sit at one of the little tables, drink tea and listen to the band. If you are nobody you promenade up and down the boulevard and listen to the band without expense. But whether you are somebody or nobody, you are almost sure to be there to listen to the band in the evening.

The birthday of the Czar's mother came while I was there, and it was celebrated by flags in the daytime and illuminations at night and a general holiday. The fact that most of the restaurants were closed, and that I had to hunt all over town to get luncheon, did not inspire me with kindly feeling toward the Czar's mother. In the middle of the band concert that night (I happened to be somebody that evening and was drinking tea), the band struck up the Russian national air. Before the middle of the second note of that magnificent anthem was reached, every one was on his feet, every one was eilent and every hat was off. They stood so until the end of the number and then applauded enthusiastically. It was not customary to applaud the band in that place. In short, the band was compelled to play the national air through three times and each time every one stood in silence and uncovered. It was a pretty fair exhibition of patriotism for the down-trodden subjects of an effete monarchy.

From Odessa to Constantinople is a ride of about thirty hours by fast steamer directly across the Black Sea. The Black Sea is not black, by the way, but bright blue like the Mediterranean—as the White Sea, the Red Sea and Yellow Sea also are, I suppose. It is one of those embarrassing sheets of water, not very large and not very small, where those who claim to be immune from sea-sickness are called below by a sudden bilious attack, and those who have less confidence in themselves on the Atlantic, stay up on deck and enjoy the moonlight.

THE PRAISE HYMNAL_

"THE PRAISE HYMNAL is in use in both the Franklin Circle and Ætna Street Churches of this city, and each week brings to me a new appreciation of the work. The dignity and variety of the contents, and the rare taste displayed in the arrangement and typography combine to make it a model church hymnal. So far as I have seen, the Responsive Readings are unequaled, and are a most attractive feature of the book.

soon rises ahead of us and apparently bars our further progress. We wonder where the Bosphorous is. Without looking very narrowly at the map, I had always taken it for granted that the Black Sea tapered down gradually to this narrow strait, but now we are coming abruptly has approached quite close can one see into the mouth of this cleft which separates Europe from Asia. It is like the mouth of a river and not one of the largest size, either. The forts which guard the Asiatic and European lips of this mouth are not more than three-quarters of a mile apart, and this is not the narrowest part of the strait.

We read with mirth and a touch of incredulity, how the navigators of the sixteenth century went up the Hudson River looking for the northwest passage to China. But it seems quite as unreasonable to expect this narrow water-way to lead on and on, now widening to a vast sea, now narrowing again to a slender strait, until finally it reaches the Atlantic and through it all the seven seas. Three times between the Black Sea and the ocean does this highway of ships contract until two continents are in sight at once. The Bosphorus and the Dardanelles seem rather to unite Asia and Europe than to separate them, and the Strait of Gibraltar, though much wider than either of the others, is the point where Europe and Africa meet.

The Bospherus is not only the narrowest but by far the most beautiful of these three straits. Hills rise abruptly from the water's edge, yet not so abruptly but that villages can find standing ground at the bottom and on the lower slopes. Isolated houses are scattered thick on the hillsides, and those at the water's edge are built out into the stream so that one may look down from their over-hanging latticed windows and see the waves lapping at the water-gate, or may drop down, as it may perhaps be sometimes necessary to do, stealthily by night into a waiting boat with muffled oars. Very likely escapades of this sort do not happen nowadays,-but again perhaps they do. There is no telling as you go by on the steamer. But at all events, there is no better place for strange adventures in all the magic East and no better place in which to localize the imaginary adventures which have no other scenes, than here on the shores of the Bosphorus, two or twenty miles from Constantinople.

There are palaces, too, as well as villages, along the shore, and here and there are rows of handsome villas where the well-to-do of the capital come to escape the summer heat of crowded and dirty Constantinople. The embassies of the foreign nations have summer homes here also and their row of handsome buildings with fluttering flags by the water's edge might be taken for a reproduction of the Rue Des Nations at the Paris Exposition where the pavilions of all lands are mirrored in the Seine. But whether palace, or villa, or village, the coloring of the scene, lit by semi-tropical sun, is vivid and delightful. The pale blues, the pale pinks and pale yellows of the houses contrast strikingly with the deep green of the cyprus (a most lugubrious tree in any other setting) and the deep blue of the Bosphorus.

After a two hours' ride through such scenes as these, the villas and villages begin to join themselves into an unbroken series and the already abundant life of the Bosphorus thickens into the perfect swarm of vessels of every type, propelled by steam, wind and car, which crowd the capacious harbor of Constantinople. To our right lies the wonderful city covering the low hills which rise from the Bosphorus. It is cut in two by the Golden Horn, a river-shaped arm of the sea, which constitutes the harbor. One has a confused impression of flat domes and slender minarets, but there is not much time now for any leisurely survey of the city, for before the vessel has dropped anchor, it is surrounded by a swarm of row-boats whose noisy oarsmen are anxious to put you ashore. The agents for all the hotels come on board at the same time and wage strenuous warfare for the possession of your person and baggage. Most of them begin by asserting that their houses are thoroughly English, but at a word of French they will stoutly maintain that French is the prevalent language with them, and if you try them with German, they will swear that their establishment is patronized almost exclusively by Germans. As a matter of fact, most of them are quite thoroughly cosmopolitan and any language and any coin will pass with them at par.

The hotel runner, who in the general melee has acquired possession of your effects, puts them and you into a row boat, lands you at the custom house and steers you through the formalities connected therewith. Being in no great hurry and having nothing to conceal, I did not think it worth while to bribe the examiner, as the custom is. It took him ten minutes to go through my two hand bags. It may be remarked here by way of anticipation that the baggage of out-going travelers is also examined at the custom house, and, as I was leaving a few days later, to save time and trouble I gave the examiner a coin worth a dime. My goods were not opened. Consider the degradation of a government whose custom-house officials not only can be bribed, but can be bribed with ten cents.

The hamals, or porters, of Constantinople are a famous tribe. In the absence of streets navigable by wheeled vehicles in many parts of the town, it is necessary to transport goods on the backs of donkeys and men, and both are equally capable of carrying surprising loads. But since there is a good carriage-way leading to the street upon which all the hotels are situated, we did not need the services of the hamals except to convey our baggage to the vehicle. Then we went through a tangle of tortuous lanes, crooked and ill paved, up-hill and down, through dense throngs of men and denser packs of dogs, till at last we came into the main street where the car track is. It boasts a width of nearly twenty foot, by reason of which fact it looks comparatively deserted. Great breadth in a street always gives that impression.

All Constantinople, like the "all Gaul" of our boyhood's Cæsar, is divided into three parts: Stamboul, Galata and Pera. Stamboul is old Constantinople, the site of the old Greek city of Bezantium, of Constantine's capital and of the Constantinople the Crusaders knew. The other parts of the city have been affected in various degrees by foreign influences, but Stamboul is the real Turkish city. The street lighting arrangements are extensive—as extensive as the solar system and the starry expanse. The system of garbage collection is as "simple and powerful" as the buckeye cure for rheumatism. The material is thrown into the street at night and the dogs do the rest. The prevalent method of street paving is calculated to make the thoroughfare resemble the boulder strewn beds of mountain torrents. May I be forgiven for ever applying to any other city the term "ill-paved."

The Golden Horn, branching off from the Bosphorus at the point where the latter is beginning to widen into the Sea of Marmora, divides what would otherwise be a semicircular city into two quadrants. Stamboul occupies one of these quadrants. The other is occupied by Galata and Pera. and the famous bridge across the Golden Horn connects Stamboul with Galata. This is the place this Galata Bridge, where one may take his stand and see all Europe and Asia go by in any half hour. It was always busy and always crowded with the most heterogeneous mass of humanity. Even a single Turk, with his red fez and baggy trousers and any sort of a coat, produces upon me the impression of a mingled multitude; but to see them by the thousand and, mingled with them, Armenians, Russians, Greeks, Cretans, Arabs, Englishmen, Roumanians and representatives of all the other tribes and nations of the known world-this is a dazzling sight.

But I like the Galata Bridge best about six o'clock in the evening, when the slanting rays of the sun come down the Golden Horn from the Sweet Waters of Europe and add their touch of flame to the myriad bobbing crimson fezzes. At this hour, too, the domes of the mosques are gilded and they look the better for it. There are plenty of domes in Constantinople, domes of the flat Byzantine type, but most of them are a dull white by the light of garish day. They are at their best by sunlight or moonlight. But at any hour one gets a comprehensive view of the city and its people from the Galata Bridge. It is to Constantinople what the Unter den Linden is to Berlin, the Grand Boulevards to Paris, the Corso to Rome, the Carl Johansgade to Christiana, the Nevski Prospect to St. Petersburg, what Broadway and Fifth Avenue together are to New York. It is the place where everybody in the city appears at least twice every twenty-four hours. I am almost of a mind to eschew the parallel between Constantinople and Gaul, and make the Galata Bridge a fourth part of the city.

Galata itself, lying across the Golden Horn from Stamboul on the sides of a steep hill which is capped by a great round tower, is called the Genoese quarter. For many years it was an inde pendent suburb of Constantinople, inhabited and controlled by the merchants of Genoa. That was in the days when Genoa and Venice were the great maritime powers of the Mediterranean, and bitter rivals. The conquest of Constantineple by the Fourth Crusade, which was deflected from its intended warfare against the Saracens to war against Greek Christians, was effected chiefly by Venetians, and the Latin kingdom of Constantinople was under Venetian influence during its existence of half a century. Naturally, the Genoese were jealous of the commercial advantage which thereby accrued to their rivals and were willing enough, when the time was ripe, to help the exiled Greek emperor win back his capital For their services on this occasion, the grateful Paleologus conceded to the Genoese this valuable suburb. Trey built a town there with a wall around it and a tower in the middle of it, which still stands as the most conspicious landmark from afar in the whole city. And they made themselves very troublesome to the too generous emperor and his successors until the Turks came two centuries later and turned out both Greeks and Genoese. So much for this digression into medieval history. Its only object is to explain the present fact of the Galata tower and the glib phrase of the guides who tell you that Galata is 'the old Genoese quarter." Any one with even a little curiosity begins at once to wonder what business the Genoese had with a whole section of Constantinople.

The third part of Constantinople is Pera. It is divided from Galata only by the somewhat imaginary line which separates the Oriental squalor of the latter from the comparatively decent Occidentalism of the former. All the foreigners except the missionaries live in Pera and the foreign shops and hotels and the legations are there. Even the slight resemblance which Pera bears to a city of Western Europe is enough to differentiate it from the rest of Constantinople It is not an absorbingly interesting section, but if any one were making a lengthy stay in the city, it would be a convenient and almost necessary place to which to retire occasionally to recover one's self-respect.

Our Twentieth Century Fund.

At a meeting of the Executive Board of the Christian Widows' and Orphans' Home in Louisville, Ky., it was decided after careful and prayerful consideration to try to raise a fifty thousand dollar twentieth century endowment fund for the

We feel confident that we will have the sympathy and hearty co-operation of every person that reads this article, because this work appeals to the heart and conscience of every friend of the poor and helpless children, that are thrown out on the world without support.

"Pure religion and undefiled before our God and Father is this, to visit the fatherless and widows in their affliction, and to keep himself unspotted from the world."

There certainly can be no more worthy work than the training ane caring for the orphan children in the church. Knowing that the Christian brotherhood is ever ready to respond to the orphan's cry and to the distressed of this land, we decided that there was no better time to begin to endow the home than the present. We want to raise ten thousand dollars in cash and pledges by January 1st, at which time, if that amount in raised, we want to have a great jubilee meeting of a day or two in this city to thank God for his blessings and to plan for more effective work in his service.

Let it be understood once for all that while this home is in Kentucky, and is supported largely by the brethren in this state, that it belongs to the brotherhood. We only have one other institution of the kind, that we know of, and it is located in St. Louis.

If we can raise a popular endowment of fifty thousand dollars for the home in Kentucky it would be a great blessing to the one located in Missonri, for it will make it much easier to raise a like endowment for that home after the appeals of this one have been placed on the heart and conscience of the brotherhood.

The time is short to raise the first ten thousand and we hope that all who read this will begin at once to help us to raise this amount. If you know of any person that you think could give a thousand dollars, send us his name, or one that you think could give five hundred, one hundred, fifty or twenty-five. Those giving one thousand wil be allowed to keep one child in t e home all the time. Any one giving five thousand will be allowed to keep five children in the home, and the fund will be called The ____ Memorial Fund, named after the giver.

What a blessing five thousand in this way would be to these little children, and what a reward you will receive in heaven; what a joy it would be to find one hundred little children before the throne of God who would say to you: "It was through your five thousand dollar gift that I was educated and prepared for the duties of life and led into the kingdom of God."

Those that give five thousand dollars would be expected to pay it within two years; these that give five hundred would be given six months, and those giving one hundred and smaller amounts would be expected to pay it by January 1st

Thousands can only give one dollar, so if that is all you are able to give, send that or give name and address and you can send it later. Let all who can give send their address and the amount at once to R. H. Otter, Box 300, Louisville, Ky.

B. B. Tyler's Letter.

A convention of Christian workers was held in Chicago Avenue Church-Moody's old church, in Chicago-from September 19th to September 26th. It was a good meeting. Such well-known workers as W. R. Newell, R. A. Torrey, James M. Gray, W. Phillips Hall, Lucy Rider Myers, Graham Taylor, Johnston Myers, W B. Jacobs and D. B. Towner were present and participated. Dr. Gray gave a number of helpful studies of the Epistle to the Ephesians. Dr. Gray is a fine teacher. I would not like to be required to endorse his orthodoxy nor his phraseology at all times, but his studies are helpful, nevertheless. In fact, when it comes to endorsement, I do not know of any whose views I am willing to youch for except my own, and to be thoroughly honest with you, I am not always certain of my own position. I am etill I arsing

I met a number of Disciples in this convention. The following names I recall: Dr. A. I. Berninger, of Indianapolis; Miss Jennie Heckler, Antioch, Ohio; Miss Thompson and Miss Galasdon, Cincinnati, and T. P. Ullom. There may have been others of "our faith and order" in this convention, but these I had the privilege of meeting. The purpose of this convention was a better equipment for winning men to Christ. Time spent in such a place is well employed. Bro. Ullom has already had good success in the ministry of the Word. If I remember correctly, he served the church in Antioch, Ohio, with such visible success that last July a house of worship was dedicated free from debt. He is taking the regular course of study in the Bible Institute in Chicago.

After the death of Col. Ingersoll and Mr. Moody, some one in a public address characterized their work, giving a preference to Ingersoll.

Here in Chicago the church that Mr. Moody founded and his Bible Institute stand as monuments to the character of service that he rendered. These properties are worth, I should say at a reasonable valuation, at leas: $200,000, and they are free from debt. The average attendance of young men and young women in training for Christian work is about 210. This is pre-eminently an English Bible school. The friends of the work are attempting to raise an endowment of $3,000,000, and I hear they are meeting with encouraging success. The method of Bible study used in the Bible Institute is not the same as that employed in the University of Chicago! The theology is somewhat old-fashioned. The style of speech is in some instances archaic. Dr. Gray had much to say in his lectures about the "mystical body of Christ." But what of it? Paul said in a letter written when he was in Rome: "Some preach Christ even of envy and strife, and some also of good will; the one do it of love, knowing that I am set for the defence of the gospel, but the others proclaim Christ of faction, not sincerely, thinking to raise up affliction for me in my bonds. What then? Only that in every way, whether in pretense or in truth, Christ is proclaimed; and therein I rejoice and will rejoice."

If Paul could rejoice that the Word was preached in his time by some even in a wicked spirit, ought we not to rejoice that the Word is studied and the Christ is exalted, even with an imperfect or an erroneous understanding, but in a spirit of divinely generated love?

There is coming to be a better understanding of the Scriptures and a more intelligent handling of the Old Book day by day. In this fact let us rejoice. It ought to be a pleasure to us to command and encourage such a work as this founded by D. L. Moody in Chicago. Can any person name anything at all comparable to it in the way of moral helpfulness, started by Mr. Ingersoll?

Mr. George William Cooke has recently been studying church methods and the ways of congregations in Massachusetts. He has not confined his investigations to a single denomination. Some of his facts and conclusions are interesting, and even surprising.

That three times as many women attend church as men is a fact with which we are all acquainted, but Mr. Augustus Daly, a noted theatrical man of New York and London, has been quoted lately as saying that the same statement is true as to the attendance at the theatres. The attendance at the Wednesday and Saturday matiness is as exclusively of women as is the attendance at the midweek prayer-meeting and conference meeting.

Mr. Cooke's observations led him to the conclusion that the number of men attending church is in inverse proportion to the liberality of the doctrinal teaching. The most conservative churches have the largest proportion of men and the dis incity liberal the smallest.

Another problem to which Mr. Cooke has given attention is the proportion of church-goers to the whole population. The number of persons who never attend church is in most towns not more than one in six or eight, and the latter figure is more likely to be correct than the first. On the other hand the number of regular attendants—that is, those who are found in church as often as every other Sunday—is not more than one in three or four of the adult population.

Mr. Cooke's conclusion is that "genuine, first-hand, personal interest in religious questions was never greater than now. This fact creates for the real preacher such an opportunity as no other Christian age has ever presented. In view of the vast spiritual needs of our time it is surprising how impotent the churches are, how ineffectual in their leadership. The trouble seems to be that the preachers are living in a world that no longer has an existence. The men of to-day are not thinking the thoughts that are uttered in the pulpits."

The Chicago Times-Herald some days ago had an editorial on "What Should Preachers Preach? The writer first of all says that "when editorial writers for the newspapers go to church it is after a six days' devotion to current politics. They have noted each new development in the situation, read the noble letters of the prominent converts who are ever passing from one side to the other, and have persevered also in that appalling, disheartening task of tugging through interminable speeches which tell them nothing that they did not know before. They are by this time steeped in politics to such an extent that no minister who has been attending to church duties can possibly enlighten them as to political facts or exert the slightest influence upon their political opinions."

The writer goes on to say that "it is a great relief when the minister eschews politics and all the daily wrangles in which they have a part, and takes them into a better and purer spiritual atmosphere."

The remark about taking people "into a better and purer spiritual atmosphere" is worthy of repetition and emphasis. There is much more of the same kind in the article from which I have quoted, but this is enough. It is interesting to preachers to hear from the pews now and again—and sometimes it is profitable as well. This man insists that to him the most interesting and helpful preaching is that of a man who is full of the doctrine of the Christ and also of his Spirit, and exalts the Christ with a holy enthusiasm. "From such preaching and such a personality one turns to the world again with higher resolves."

Kansas City Letter.

Kind friends, we bid you one and all to come to our convention, or rather to your convention, held at our house. Our welcome is wide, our invitation sincere. We want you to come. Preparation is being made for your coming, and we are frank to say this means a good deal of work for us all, but then this is a labor of love. We do not mind the work, but what we should very much mind is your possible failure to come. Really, you can't afford to miss it. Now this is a stock expression, but a very undeniable truth is beneath it. Your absence will not only be our loss, but yours. About the convention feast you have heard from others. Our secretaries know how to spread an appetetizing table. The programme is attractive. You will enjoy it to the very close. But then there is something else besides the program-Kansas City. If you have never seen this young Western giant, come and inspect his thews, his steellike muscle, his great strength. This young commercial Hercules is worth looking at.

Well, this town by the Kaw hasn't a very ancient history. The history began only yesterday, but its short chapter is full of incident and marvel. In the sixties only a little trading post: a little later a flourishing hamlet; the next hour a boom city with all the riot of speculation, the rawness of newness, the extravagance and pretension, the wildness and license of commercialism run mad, all a-bristle with fables and-lies: then the boom collapse with its ruin and its bitterness; then the upward struggle of an indomitable energy and the miracles of reconstruction; and now-the largest city for its size in the world, kind sir, and spite of Eastern sneers at Western license the best. Kansas City, like Jerusalem, like Rome, like all other great cities is on the hills. It is well to tell you that before you come, although this scribe has a secret belief that you would find it out without help. We have more than seven hills-more than seven times seven. The number is so great that as yet they have been uncounted. Such marvels of enterprise already exhibited in their filing and cutting down, and withal such devotion to them as they are. All Kansas Cityans are proud of these hills and the uniqueness they confer upon the city. In sober truth they make for an infinite variety. And then Kansas City can boast of looking down upon the muddest and crookedest river in the world-the Missouri. The Rhine may be pellucid, the Rhone swift rushing, the Amazon majestic, the Hudson picturesque, but for an infinity of twistings and the healthiness of mud. commend me to the Missouri. Though muddy, these waters are pure, the sand constituting a natural filter, and you are proudly told that they are the purest in the world and are shipped to the Atlantic Coast to supply the great ocean liners. Don't fail to look at these waters some day through Western singers to be made classic.

Then our packing houses! Do you know that Kansas City is a livestock center is second only to Chicago and destined soon to surpass even the Windy City? The thousands upon thousands of cattle, sheep and hogs slaughtered here would make a Buddhist sick! If you are in love with a sensation, by all means visit Armour's, Swift's or some other of these great institutions.

You can reach them with ease. The street car system is said to be one of the best and if you, disdaining these democratic conveyances, want to see the city behind a span of Kentucky high-steppers, you can roll over positively the finest streets in America. Miles upon miles of asphalt white, and glistening—more miles, bear in mind, of this beautiful material than may be found in any other American city save Buffalo.

While en route your driver will pelt you with statistics of the city's growth and business. He will tell you -- and tell you the truth, mark youthat Kansas City has more railroads than Cincinnati, more than Philadelphia, more than St. Lotis, more than any other city save Chicago, and when the next road is built will be first. He will tell you that this is the greatest center for distribution of agricultural implements in the world. He will dilate upon the great horse and mule markets. He will help you to look clear to the top of the great office buildings. He will assure you that you are in the heart of the finest agricultural country in the world. He will by no means fail to declare that the volume of business done by this city is greater by far than any other city of its size in the United States, exceeding, as shown by the clearing-house returns, such cities as Buffalo, Louisville, Cleveland, neck and neck with Cincinnati, bowing only to the commercial superiority of Pittsburg, St. Louis and a half dozen others of our great metropolitan towns. He's a great talker, this guide. He can "blow," to be sureequal to a Kansas breeze, in fact. He's an enthusiast, this guide, and always tells you the truth.

Do you get just a trifle bored by his impertinence and venture to crop his feathers by saying: "Yes, its a pretty good place to make money, but that's all?" The next moment he will begin a fresh bombardment. He will point you to two great high school buildings with their three thousand students and assure you that these and the ward schools are notable in all the educational world and that committees from all over the country journey here to study the system. He will show you a public library which Mr. Carnegie did not build, classic in its lines and elegant in its simplicity. He will show you substantial church buildings (though he will admit that in this respect the city does not compare favorably with some others) and then take you over a system of parks and boulevards not to be duplicated, when all completed, by any city in the land. He's quite bumptious, this guide. His egotism is almost an infirmity, but then he's in dead earnest about it all.

If you have a latent suspicion that this hypothetical guide is not truthful and that there isn't anything here in Kaw-town to see, journey hitherward. It may not be the story of the Queen of Sheba astonishment retold, but it will convince you that—what? This column is yours after the convention to answer. So once more we bid you come to the great convention.

GEORGE H. COMBS.

Illinois District Convention.

The seventh district missionary convention was held at Fairfield, Ill, Sept. 4-6 with very gratifying results. The first afternoon and evening was taken up by the C. W. B. M. Besides the delegates were the following ladies who took part in making their meeting a success: Sister Anna M. Hale, state organizer, who presided with dignity and also gave some very interesting facts about the work of the C. W. B. M.; Sister Mamie Towne, of Cairo, the president of the 8th district of the C. W.B. M., was present and made a beautiful talk, full of facts and figures. She was also chosen as president of the 7th district. But the crowning point of the occassion was when Sister Josepha Franklin, one of our missionaries to India, gave us a description of the manners and customs of the inhabitants of India, and showed many of their curious handmade articles. This closed the afternoon session. At night she lectured on the mission work and the condition of the famine sufferers. A splendid practical program. A few on program were unavoidably absent, but their places were supplied by others who did justice to the subjects and credit to themselves.

Bro. J. J. Harris, 8th district evangelist, was present and assisted with encouraging words and timely advice. This was much appreciated, coming from a man of Bro. Harris' experience and ability.

When it came to the question of putting an evangelist in the 7th district, Bro. J. A. Bottenfield, after an hour's talk, which was characteristic for its logic and zeal, impressed the convention with the fact that we need a man in the field, and when it came time to decide the convention was unanim usly in favor of it and raised part of the money therefor. We not only expect to have one, but before the close of the year we expect to have four.

At the close of the convention the evening of the last day Bro. Jones delivered a strong lecture in which he admonished us to do our duty regardless of the opinion of men; and if we do this we need not fear results.

Those who were not there missed a very great treat; so begin preparing to attend our next convention. Fraternally, Lew D. Hill.

More Boxes of Gold,

AND MANY GREENBACKS.

To secure additional information directly from the people, it is proposed to send little boxes of gold and greenbacks to persons who write the most interesting, detailed and truthful description of their experience on the following topics:

- 1. How have you been affected by coffee drinking and by changing from coffee to Postum?
- 2. Do you know any one who has been driven away from Postum because it came to the table weak and characterless at the first trial?
- 3. Did you set the person right regarding the easy way to make Postum clear, black, and with a crisp, rich taste?
- 4. Have you ever found a better way to make it then to use four heaping teaspoonfu's to the pint of water, let stand on stove until real boiling begins, then note the clock and allow it to continue easy boiling full 15 minutes from that time, stirring down occasionally? (A piece of butter about the size of a navy bean placed in the pot will prevent boiling over.)
- 5. Give names and account of those you know to have been cured or helped in health by the dismissal of coffee and the daily use of Postum Food Coffee in its place.
- 6. Write names and addresses of 20 friends whom you believe would be benefited by leaving off coffee. (Your name will not be divulged to them.)

Address your letter to Postum Cereal Co., Ltd. Battle Creek, Mich., writing your own name and address clearly.

Be honest and truthful, don't write poetry or fanciful letters, just plain, truthful statements.

Decision will be made between October 30 and November 10, 1900, by three judges, not members of the Postum Cereal Co., and a neat little box containing a $10 gold piece sent to each of the five best writers, a box containing a $5 gold piece to each of the 20 next best writers, and a $2 greenback to each of the 100 next best, and a $1 greenback to the 200 next best writers, making cash prizes distributed to 325 persons.

Almost every one interested in pure food and drink is willing to have their name and letter appear in the papers for such help as it may offer to the human race. However, a request to omit name will be respected.

Every friend of Postum is urged to write and each letter will be held in high esteem by the company, as an evidence of such friendship, while the litte boxes of gold and envelopes of money will reach many modest writers whose plain and sensible letters contain the facts desired, although the sender may have but small faith in winning at the time of writing.

Talk this subject over with your friends and see how many among you can win prizes. It is a good, honest competition and in the best kind of a cause. Cut this statement out, for it will not appear again.

Interesting History.

The following letter by our beloved Brother J. Lamar, written to Mrs. F. J. Spratling, Editress the Department of the Woman's Society for orgia Missions, in the Southern Evangelist, der whose auspices this meeting was held, will interesting reading to all who know Brother mar, or rejoice at Christian victories:

DEAR SISTER SPRATLING:-I see that you blessed men are sending the gifted and beloved O. P. egel to Columbus. May God be with him and give abundant success. It may be that I alone am are of the fact that the primitive gospel was ee preached in Columbus, and by your own evernored grandfather; and if you can accord me a le space I will tell you about it. I am the more erested in it because it was just fifty years o, so that Bro. Spiegel's meeting is to me a sort jubilee. If you can read my report of the first lumbus meeting without laughing, it may be od for us, while we accompany Bro. Spiegel th our earnest prayers and sympathies, to think the difference between now and then. It should be stated that my brother Philip F.

i myself, living several miles from the city, re both young men, and the only Disciples in at whole region. We had very little money, no perience, no guidance, nothing in fact, but un anded faith in the original gospel. It seemed us that if the people could only hear it eached it would "go like hot cakes," and would erally sweep everything before it. Well, by ance we saw in a magazine a communication m Dr. Daniel Hook, evangelist of Georgia. We d never seen him or heard of him before, and re not sure whether he would be equal to the avy task before him. We felt sure that the ters of the Chattahoochee would be often and eatly agitated, and if Dr. Hook proved to be t a very strong man he might not be able to do the necessary baptizing, but as we had proved our neighbors over and over again that the elve apostles had baptized 3,000 in one dayd "baptized them by immersion" at that -we ncluded to risk it! So after some correspondce and delay, Dr. Hook came, a fine, portly genman, and we felt easy about the baptisms. We d rented the finest hall in the city, arranged for hting, etc., advertised conspicuously in the mes and Enquirer, had a Bible and some sort of mn book on the stand, and felt that all things ere ready. A few minutes before the hour of rvice we concluded to repair to the hall, so as t to keep the congregation waiting. We were obably a little too soon, as no one was present; t we marched boldly to the front, and admired e fine and well-lighted hall and were rejoiced to e the abundant provision of seats for a large ngregation. This had been one of the points sisted on by us, as we feared we might not have ats enough! We waited and looked at our atches, and then admired the hall and seats some ore. After awhile the sexton came in and ked a little at one of the windows, and screwed one or two of the lights-which was encouragg. In process of time, not to say process of ernity, three or four people came in, looking irious, wide eved and amused, and by the time e had got fully under way two or three more sined them. We had no singers among us, but well as I remember we did try a verse or two "Amazing Grace," and then concluded to disontinue this "delightful part of the worship." But the sermon was excellent, for Dr. Hook was ot only one of the best of men but best of reachers; and the six or eight of us there that ight, including the sexton, heard such preaching B we had never heard before. But it was funny, s we went to the hotel, to hear Bro. Philip trying hearten up Dr. Hook by explaining to him the mallness of the crowd; but neither Philip nor I ever intimated, for indeed we did not know that it was all owing to the fact we were trying to run the thing by common nonsense rather then common sense. Suffice it to say, we continued two or three nights more with the same result, and then adjourned sine die.

I suppose that most people would call that first Columbus meeting a stupendous failure; and in one sense it was. There was no additions by 'primary obedience," by "letter," by "statement" or by any of the numerous ways that we read about in the Acts of the Apostles and our other religious publications -not one! But toat meeting did result in the production of two Christian preachers, such as they were: one of them a very good one, as the numerous churches in Northeast Georgia can testify; the other, never good for much except to "hold the fort." But let it be recorded that whatever we two have done by tongue or pen, for God and man, for the church and the world, may be and should be traced to Dr. Hook's meeting in Columbus fifty years ago. And now let us look and long and pray for a glorious jubilee. May God help Brother Spiegel in his work there. Lovingly yours,

J. S. LAMAR.

The second meeting in Columbus, fifty years after the first, closed Aug. 11, after continuing nearly thirty five days. The large central tent was full of interested hearers at every service. Often we were unable to crowd them all into the tent. There were 28 additions from all sources including a very pious, well-posted Baptist minister. We organized an interesting congregation in that beautiful city of some thirty thousand people. They had a good meeting last Sunday, the first Sunday after their organization. So while the first meeting in Columbus resulted in two preachers, the second one, fifty years later, has resulted in one preacher already! The South is surely taking hold of primitive Christianity.

Omaha Notes.

Last week we attended the Nebraska State Convention, held at Bethany (Lincoln) in a beautiful grove on the assembly plan. The large assembly tent was surrounded on two sides with delegates' tents, and the dining tent stood near by. All seemed to enjoy this plan so well that it was decided to hold next year's convention in the same place and in the same manner. The attendance reached near 300, and the convention was most enthusiastic and helpful and uplifting throughout.

The writer preached the opening sermon on Tuesday night to a congregation almost filling the great tent. Such an audience was both a surprise and a delight. Nebraska has a noble company of preachers, many of them young in years, but manifesting a beautiful spirit of earnestness and ambition to plant the standard of the primitive faith and order in every part of the great state. This being my first Nebraska state meeting, very many of these men I met here for the first time.

Bro. Muckley's address on Church Extension was the best I ever heard him make, and he always does well; and Benj. L. Smith fired all hearts with his splendid setting forth of the vision of opportunity in this ripe American field. Miss Frost spoke for India and Bro. F. E. Meigs for China, and right well did they enforce the plea of the waiting millions in these dark lands. Bro. J. H. Hardin, now of Missouri, spoke most forcibly to the ministers present about some things lying at the foundation of success in the noblest of all callings. Many of the other addresses were extremely helpful, and the whole program as it was made and carried out reflected credit both on those who arranged it and those who participated n it. I suspect that the efficient secretary, W.

A. Baldwin, had much to do with this gratifying success.

The convention took an advance step in its decision to place a state evangelist in the field for his whole time. This man is also to act as state secretary. A guarantee fund for his support was raised by 41 persons agreeing to be responsible for $25 each, if not raised from other sources, This will mean enlargement for Nebraska, and this is what every one in the state desires. All rejoice in what has been done under the wise leadership of Bro. Baldwin, and all are hoping for greater victories in the coming year. God grant that the church may rally more loyally to the most important work of state missions.

Here in Omaha progress is being made in al our churches. The Grant Street Church, under the leadership of Pastor W. T. Hilton, is growing in numbers and in favor with all the people. Several hundred dollars' indebtedness has been paid, the church house painted, carpeted and otherwise improved, and our general missionary enterprises aided by handsome offerings.

Bro. Howard Cramblet is pushing forward in South Omaha, and a new church building is among the forward movements planned for the future.

The First Church, 20th and Capitol Avenue, has kept right on during the hot weather and all departments of church work are alive; 58 persons have been added at regular church services since April 1st, only a few Sundays without additions. Besides current expenses about $1,200 has been paid on the church's indebtedness, and the women have raised about $200 and put a fine carpet on the church. The missionary offerings have been taken as follows: Foreign Missions, $68; Home Missions, $60; Church Extension, $23.25; state and Omaha missions about $50.

Church Dedication.

Sunday, Sept. 9, our new church building at this place was dedicated to the service of the Lord. The day was clear and perfect, the crowd was large and cheerful. As soon as it was learned that our good people of Washbarn and Mt. Zion would suspend their regular services in the morning, in order to attend and assist at Cazenovia, a large tent (which proved to be a necessity) was procured and placed along beside the church building to hold the ove flow of people. The first regular service was held at 10:30 o'clock. The sermon was preached by Rev. Thes. J. Shuey, of Valparaiso, Ind., assisted by Rev. J. W Kilborn, of Washbara, and our pastor, B. L. Wray, of Eureka. A call for $350 was made and it was responded to by cash and pledges to the ammount of $266, after which the congregation was dismissed to partake of a basket dinner in the tabernacle. At 2:30 P. M. the work of raising money was continued until the amount of $361 92, all told, was raised and the dedicatory service took place, conducted by Bro. Shuey, who preached the dedicatory sermon, assisted again by Bro. Kilborn and Bro. Wray.

We are very grateful to our people of Washburn and Mt. Zion and neighboring friends who so kindly assisted us with their presence and in a material way by their liberal contribution, to erect the beautiful new building in which we can now worship, dedicated to the service of the Lord; and especially do we desire to thank Bro. Shuey for his noble services of the day and to thank Bro. Kilborn who has been a help and guide by his wise counsel and services during his stay at Washburn; and also to thank our pastor, Bro. Wray, who pushed the work with energy to the end.

J. G. MUNDELL, Church Sec. Cazenovia, Ill., Sept. 16, 1900.

Missouri Bible-school Notes.

Fourteen schools will hold railies this month or next, six will combine their fall rally with that of "Boys' and Girls' Rally Day of America"—a first-class idea. This puts your rally the fourth Sanday in November, generally one of the best seasons of the year. Do not forget that Bro. B. La. Smith, Y. M. C. A. Building, Cincinnati, Ohio, will send you supplies in any desired quantity for whis glad day, including class banks, home banks, the rally day medal and concert exercises on "The Flag and the Cross." It is very fine. All schools can use and enjoy it, but it will be the better enjoyed by thorough preparation.

W. M. Featherston and the secretary were at Prairie Hill rally, J. C. Naylor, superintendent. The program was carried out in full, with three sessions a day, while the drills were so interesting that we had difficulty in deciding those excel ing. The Methodist and union schools joined us in the afternoon and evening sessions, adding much to the enthusiasm, while the pastor and superintendent had made thorough work in the preliminaries and decided adopting the newer methods in their regular work, but the co-operation of the church in our general work, led by the pastor, caused your servant to rejoice greatly.

When schools like Philadelphia can give to this work, all others are without excuse, for beyond their ability do they help us. "Where there is a will there is a way." The task is getting people to have the will. But here brethren like J. O. Walton one of the Canton boys, can render us good service.

R. B. Havener has done a good work at Rolla, reviving the work, with 14 additions. He is now at Villa Ridge, supported by the fund given us by S. G. Newlon, and with which we hope to build a house of worship.

The children of Buffalo are with us under the efficient leadership of E. B. Wood, and we will send them a "souvenir" each this week. Our souvenirs are not buttons nor "brass dollars," but are such as will do the recipient good service, and for the coming year will be nicer and neater than ever.

While E. J. Lampton has resigned at Louisiana, that is no proof of his leaving, for the people have not been heard from yet, and when they are mail will still be addressed to the "old town," while for the pulpit there, none need apply.

Arouse your Bible school, Israel, and do not permit them to think of adjourning the school until next April. To this end hold your rally, making it an all day session, and then covenant all for the winter's campaign. Write this office for Rally Day sample, or better, B. L. Smith as above, and invite other schools to join you and make a great big day of it, catching such spirit and enthusing that not one will want a cessation of this good cause, and you will see the blessed results during the winter's work. Try it.

The cards for the second quarter will be in the hands of our friends before these notes are read, but the devoted F. F. Schultz, of the First, St. Louis, has been added to our force, believing that God and the brethren will support him, and this is to urge your immediate co-operation in supporting all the force.

District Co-operation C. W. B. M.

The C. W. B. M. session of the tenth annual Nodaway Valley District Co-operation Convention at Grant City, Mo., Wednesday afternoon, Aug. 29, was one of the best ever held in the district. The meeting was presided over by Mrs. H. S. Gilliam, state manager. The work done by Sister Gilliam in the district since the removal of Sister Dew, our district president, to Ohi, has been very helpful. We regret to lose Sister Dew from the district and from the state. A very interesting program had been prepared. Address, "Value of the C. W. B. M. to the Church," A. R. Hunt, Savannah, Mo. He spoke of the origin of the work; he showed woman's work and influence in the church and the world, the object of the C. W. B. M. and the help the organization has been to women. The spirit of the C. W. B. M. is worldwide, and opposition only urges weman on to greater efforts for Christ. An excellent paper was read by Miss Nannie Pelley, Grant City, "The Influence of the Junior Endeavor Work," showing the result of Christian influence over the child and the responsibility of parents. The paper read by Mrs. Alice Ray, Maryville, Mo., "The Work and Workers of the C. W. B. M. and Future Prospects," was listened to with great interest by all. She gave a history of the work from the peginnirg, from the first missionaries sent out, of the work that has been done both at home and in the foreign field. We have reached our 26th milestone, the opportunity presented to the Christian and the responsibility that rests upon us all. If so much could be accomplished when our members are so limited, what might the result be if all were engaged in this great work? Inspiring address, "My Five Years' Work in India," by Miss Mattie Burgess, a returned missionary. Miss Adelaide Gail Frost's song, "Our Sunset Song," by Grant City quartette, and a beautiful song, "This Way, Papa," was sung by the Grant City Juniors. A collection of $9.90 was taken for state work. A song by Miss Burgess in Hindu. Thursday afternoon a report of the auxiliaries was heard. Work reported in the district to July, 1900: Number of suxiliaries, 16; members, 226; increase, 40; life members, 16; life memberships taken during the year, four; dues paid, $132.80; number paying double dues, one; special offerings, $116.25; applied on life memberships, $57.50 state work, $22.67; number of Tidings taken 35; to be paid Sept. 20th to the Virginia Bibl Chair Fund and applied on life membershi $12.50; Junior C. E. Society reported, four. Mary ville has a membership of 137, and 12 of th number have made the confession this year They are trying by the 2 cts. per month plan t raise $30. Tarkio Junior members, 30; mone collected, $5. Officers elected for the ensuing year district manager, Mrs. Alice Ray, Macyv lie, Mo district secretary, Mrs. Hattie Shoptaugh, Marville, Mo.; county presidents: Nodaway, Mrs. H. Todd, Maryville, Mo.; Andrew, Mrs. Alv Pettyj hn, Rosendale, Mo.; Holt, Mrs. Hanna Elliott, Mound City, Mo.; Atchison, Mrs. Hen: Hurst, Tarkio, Mo; Worth, Mrs. Lillie Stone Grant City, Mo.

The School Of Pastoral Helpers.

The School of Pastoral Helpers opened September 18. The students present at the openin were Misses Madge L. Kent, Chagrin Falls, Jennie Jenkinson, Belfontaine, O., Cora McLaiz Indianapolis, Ind., Stella Masten, Ludlow Ky Essie N. Gould, Lawrence, Kan., and May Whaley Cincinnati, O. Several more are expected thiterm. Three applications are in already for the second term, which opens January 15. Ever one who comes is highly recommended for the work by her pastor and others. Our teachers are of one mind that the school is as large as it ought to be the first term. We may admit the more in January.

Of the present number Miss May Whaley wa with us last spring and will be well equipped to work by the close of this term, and the churc that employs her will be extremely fortunate.

Brethren F. M. Rains and A. McLean were present and gave us words of hope and cheer. The class of young women this kind of work attract insures its success.

The Home Land.

"Here we have no continuing city."

MRS. P. R. GIBSON.

When the heart is filled with longing, Born of love and memory. Comes a vision of the home-land, Just beyond the silver sea.

And sweet voices, so long silent, Borne across the silver wave, Chant again the old time music, With its power to bless and save.

"Jesus, tender Shepherd, lead me." "Nearer, O my God, to Thee!"
"All hail the power of Jesus' name." "Rock of Ages cleft for me.

Then a gleam across the water, From that city - God is light - Shows in vision, dear home faces, And our home-land just in sight. St. Lonis, Mo.

Washington, (D. C.) Letter.

I shall devote my communication this week to the children. If the older folks want to read it there is no objection. I shall put what I have to say in a string of stories, so that you can fasten it in your minds.

Among our preachers there is one who is a chaplain in the United States Navy. He is a very good and patriotic man. He has a boy who happened to be born in a foreign country, who is just as patriotic, if not so good as his father. At times he is apt to lose his temper, and nothing angers him so quickly as to have the boys call him a "Dago." One day, after a burst of passion, he said in confidence to a preacher who was visiting at his home: "Yes, I was born in Italy, but then I was so small I couldn't help myself."

If the boys are tempted to "get mad and fight," girls, it is said, are inclined to be vain.

Irma, a six-year-old Washington girl was practising the part of fairy in an operetta, which was to be a part of the commencement exercises. She played her part, as the older girls said, "so cute" that much applause and petting fell to her lot. Then she got "above herself" and the teacher could really do nothing with her. When she went home after the rehearsal she bore a note to her mother. When she was being put to bed that night her mother told her how grieved she was to hear that one of the little girls at the rehearsal that afternoon had been ugly and how she hoped that little girl would repent and do better. Then she told her to say her prayers. Irma knelt at her mother's knee and said: "O Lord, bless mamma and papa and Minnie and Basil and the baby." Then she paused for a moment, digging her pink toes in the carpet. "Now I've got something else to say, but you will will laugh, mamma."

"No, darling, mamma would never laugh at your prayer," she said as she stroked the brown head.

"Well then, God, if you know anybody that's been naughty, please to make them good."

Among the incidents of my ministry that I like to recall is one that occurred in Newport News, Va. A Sunday-school teacher said to me: "After the lesson this morning, Janey R. said, 'I want to be baptized and be a Christian.' She is so young I was afraid she did not understand what this meant, so I said, 'Why do you want to be baptized and become a Christian?' She answered, 'Because I love Jesus and want to do what he tells me.'

On one of the fashionab'e avenues in a great Eastern city is a handsome mansion. In this house upon a certain evening a dinner party was to be given. The little girl of the family, much against her will, was sent to bed. Before the guests arrived the mother came into the dining room to see that all was in readiness. While surveying the table from a corner (the lights were turned low) she was surprised to see her little girl arrayed in her night robe, tripping softly into the room. The mother watched her as she climbed into a chair and reaching over took the topmost dainty from the fruit basket and hastily left the room. The mother was shocked and stood wondering how she should punish the little culprit-Then she looked and saw the girl tripping back, climb again into the chair, deposit the stolen fruit in its place, and as she slipped out exclaimed in a self-pleased tone, "Fooled again, naughty devil!"

It was Children's Day at Ninth Street Church. Among those who were to take part in the exercises was Maude, who was very nervous and was afraid she could not get through without a shower of tears. She came in leading a lady by the hand. Bringing her to me she said: "Mr. B., please give mamma a seat in the front row." I brought in an extra chair and seated the lady in front of the platform. When Maude's turn came she looked straight at her mother, and encouraged by her presence and smile, got through with hardly a tremor in her voice.

Now as you recall the stories let me tell you the things I would have you remember. There are some things for which you are not responsible. You had nothing to say as to the place or time of your birth; you were "so small you could not help yourself." You did not have the privilege of choosing your parents, though I expect most us think we would choose just those we have. We inherited from our ancestors traits of character, the tendency to certain vices and certain virtues. Our early years are passed amid circumstances that strongly influence us. For these things we are not responsible. But as we grow older we become conscious of the difference between the right and wrong. We find it possible to do the right and shun the wrong. But we do not always do this. Instead we are apt to cleave to the evil and abhor the good. "We place self-will and selfishness above the claims of love and duty." This is sin. Sin must be repented and forsaken. It will not do to confess sin in general. Little Irma's prayer was not as good as the publican's: "Lord be merciful to me a sinner.'

As soon as boys and girls become co scious of sin and the need of forgivene they should become candidates for baptis and church membership.

No one ever gave a better reason for de siring to take this step than Janey's "b cause I love Jesus and want to do what h tells me."

After your baptism you will be a discip of Jesus, that is a learner; you will sit at h feet and learn of him. You will be a Chri tian or Christ's one, a follower of Chris As Jesus after his baptism was tempted the devil, so you will be tempted. It is a sin to be tempted, but it is a sin to yield 1 temptation.

It is better to say in the beginning, "Ge behind me, Satan!" We should fool th naughty devils, defeat them and win th victory.

The secret of victory is to know the Jesus is near and in times of trouble look him. "Wherefore, laying aside every weigh and the sin which doth so easily beset u let us run with patience the race that set before us, looking unto Jesus."

A Benefactor in the Home.

BY S. H. H.

If you wish to have good cheer in th home you must have a beaconlight to a tract all that belong to its fold, and this a well-kept, cheery, bright, shining lam one that the family can read by, not a dir weird, flickering light that depresses ar sends a gloom all about. A well kept lam is a real benefactor in the home, for when one has electric lights or gaslights, the prefer a lamp to read by, and yet in th country a lamp is a necessity; h nce th housewife should strive to have it sen out a cheerful, brilliant, steady ligh for it is the magnet often that keeps th boys around the fireside and at home. It imperative to have thorough cleanliness lamps. It is like the human body, it suffer for the want of a bath every day. Or should use the best of headlight oil, as the cheap oils are not safe. There are a great many theories about cleaning lamps, but a excellent quick way is to dissolve a teaspoor ful of pearline into a basin of hot water ar plunge the wick, burner and all into the suds and leave it for a few seconds, then r move and dry. It will remove all the stick gummy substance, then wash the chimne clean and bright and fill the bowl full of c every day, as a lamp will not give a good light if only half filled. Lamp chimneys as not so liable to break upon exposure changes of temperature if they are put in pan of cold water and allowed to heat gra ually until the water is boiling, then leave in the water until cold again. Clean th flues and wash them well in the hot suds as see that the flues fit closely so there will no danger of them falling off. Good ligh means good health and good cheer in the family, and I think them a great benefactor Georgetown, Ky., Sept. 21, 1900.

Just Common Folks.

If only the sweetest bells were rung, How we should miss the minor chimes, If only the grandest poets sung. Thered be no simple little rhymes. The modest clinging vine adds grace To all the forest's giant oaks. And mid earth's mighty is a place To people with just common folks.

Not they the warriors who shall win Upon the battlefield a name
To sound above the awful din;
Not theirs the painter's deathless fame;
Not theirs the poets muse that brings
The rythmic gift his soul invokes;
Theirs but to do the simule things
That duty gives j ist common folks.

Fate has not lifted them above
The level of the human plane;
They share with men a fellow love,
In touch with pleasure and with pain.
One great, far reaching brotherhood,
With common burdens, common yokes,
And common wrongs, and common good—
God's army of just common folks.

In or Out of Tune.

The following is the report of a sermon eached by M. E. Harlan in the Christian ruch in Brooklyn, N. Y., recently, as it pears in the Brooklyn Eagle. To keep in ne is one of the important things of life.

"In the world of music some voices are at,' while others are 'sharp,' but whether arp or flat are makers of discord or out of ne. So in the civic or religious life some ves are out of tune and discordant. A scordant note in an organ is no more pain-I to an audience than a harsh, 'sharp,' disrdant life in a church or neighborhood. l lovers of harmony become exceedingly rvous and irritable when made to sit rough a piano recital or musical with rsh, discordant notes. So one discordant sturber of harmony can keep a whole ighborhood irritated and make them all onder if there is harmony anywhere. The xt suggests that a life without love would like thumping on a piece of brass, and nat nervous distraction to a neighborhood ould be a constant marching through the reets of a band of maniacs beating on ass vessals

"The text is forcefully illustrated in the sitation of the sick and those in distress. he whose body is in constant anguish will sweet-tempered and pleasant, while the her with no more pain or loss will be sour complaining. One is in tune and the her out of tune. One is an old, worthless gan with the reeds all broken and the tes all 'flat.' The other is as the great rp of David, upon which even the winds adversity played the sweetest strains. me people can sing 'Old Hundred' fairly ell if pitched to suit their voices, but they e all in harmony in 'high G.' So, some ople who do real well when everything pes to suit them will go all to pieces when l do not want te sing their low tones. me people can endure great suffering and pleasant, and yet become harsh when the rvant giri breaks a piece of chinaware. ne may be a member in good standing in e church or the community and yet harsh id unlovely.

"We are anxious to have only master musicians to tune our instruments. Paul would say that love is the master musician that would attune our lives and give them a full, rich tone and puts the prize upon our fellowship. Love in morals is as harmony in music, and even things different are made to blend. Be in tune."

The Whistling Boy.

We like the whistling boy. We like to fall in behind him as we go down the street. He has as many tunes as the mocking bird. If it is Monday morning, the Sunday-school tunes follow him. If it is after the Dewey parade, the last thing from Sousa. It is the young folks who set the standard in music. The great composer may sigh in vain for recognition until comes the whistling boy and girl at the piano, then his success is assured. If whistling is any index, American boys are full of music. Alone, as he drives the cows to pasture or rides the horses to water, or goes on errands, the boy takes up the burden of the latest air and makes his ways melodious. It is not to keep his courage up, as the old proverb implies; it is to communicate his superabundant life to others; it is to bubble over as does the fountain. And these airs go about as by some vocal infection, until every other boy has added them to his catalogue of accomplishments.—The Christian Herald.

The Teacher of Paderewski.

The chief attraction at Vienna has been Professor Leschetitzky. the teacher of Paderewski, and perhaps the best known of all teachers of piano. He is moody and impatient, but is a prince of good fellows to the pupil who shows talent or excessive industry. He has taught most of the great American pianists.

I visited Professor Leschetitzky at his summer house at Ischl, and during our conversation he made the following statements in regard to American music students which are well worth their attention:

"They ought not come to us unless they are musical and know music."

"Too many of them don't know how to touch the piano, and I have neither the time nor the patience to teach the scales."

"A talented man or woman ought by all means to come over here, if only to see how little he or she knows about music."

"Your young pe ple lack depth and industry. They are very enthusiastic at first, but most of them drop off when the hard work begins."—Edward A. Steiner, in the October Woman's Home Companion.

Do you read what people say about Hood's Sarssparilla? It is curing all forms of disease caused or promoted by impure blood.

The Long-distance Wooing of Wu.

How the Chinese Minister at Washington, Wu Ting fang, secured, when a young man and about to be married, the unusual privilege of seeing, before the wedding day, the girl who was to be his wife, was told by him to several friends a few days ago.

"In China our young men do not select wives for themselves, but leave it to their parents," said he.

"We know that our parents want us to be happy and we are willing to let them judge who will make a good wife. The young man is never permitted to see, before the ceremony, the one whom he is to marry.

"We have few unhappy marriages in China and perhaps that is because we do not spend all the affection before marriage, as it seems to me the young people in America sometimes do.

"I was very anxious to see the girl my parents had chosen for me, but they told me it would be impossible to have an interview or even a formal meeting and that I could not even see her. But after I had begged very hard they finally consented to let me have one look at her, and the permission overjoyed me.

"So, one day, I sat by a window, behind a blind which entirely hid me. After waiting a long time, three young women came down the street and I was told that one of them was to be my future wife.

"'But which one? Which one is she?' I demanded eagerly, and when I was told that it was the one on the outside I looked at her harder and with greater delight than I ever looked at anything else either before or since."

The minister was silent for a few moments and his mind was evidently busy with the pleasant past. Then he said with a half chuckle:

"What I was curious to know, but couldn't find out, was whether the future Mrs. Wu knew I was looking at her. Oh, it was entirely contrary to Chinese etiquette—entirely—but I shall never forget how happy I felt as my bride-to-be came so prettily up the street!"—Saturday Evening Post.

A Pueblo Legend.

Donaldson Crffery......President

Archibal Murray HoweVice-President Union Reform Party-September.

Through all the gro esque darkness of Pueblo superstition, writes Marion Hill in Frank Leslie's Popular Magazine for October, runs a bright thread of poetic legend; and one I gend, since it is woven around the ruined estufa in the ruined Pueblo of Pecos, has a right to be told here.

Pecos was founded by the man-god, the great Montezuma bimself, and he therefore pro' ably felt a protective interest in it; at any rate, when the usurping Spaniards lay upon the conquered Pueblos a cursed rule of restraint and wrong, Montezuma invoked against them the aid of his brother gods in heaven. These told him to plant a tree upside down beside the chief estufa of Pecos, and to light a holy fire upon the altar, and if the fire were kept burning until the tree fell, then would there come to the rescue of the oppressed a great pale-face nation, and deliver them from the Spanish thrall.

So the fire was lit, and a sentinel was posted to guard its sacred flame; and the tree was planted-under the circumstances the planter would be excusable in planting the tree as insecurely as possible. But year after year passed, and the tree remained standing. Sentinel su ceeded sentinel, and the flame lived on. Generations withered away, yet deliverance seemed no nearer. One day there came a rumor from old Santa Fe that the city had surrendered to a whitefaced people. Was this the band of delivers? That day at noon the sacred tree toppled and fell. Spanish rule was no more. The prophecy had been fulfilled.

If there be an unbeliever of this legend, et him go to the ruins of Pecos and see for himself that whereas the city was built upon a mesa so barren that no trees are there, yet across the crumbling estufa lies the fallen b dy of a pine of mighty growth. The like of it is not for many miles around. Whence did it come?

A Misunderstanding.

Mr. G. W. Stevens, in his book, "In India," says that the first sight of that country is amazing and stupefying, because everything is so noticeable that you notice nothing. The common crows are blue, the oxen have humps; it is a new life in a new world. In describing the native life he gives this story of their indifference to punishment:

A simple ryot, the other day, had said good-by to his relatives, and was pinioned, when suddenly he asked to speak again to his brother.

"Recollect," he said, "it's twenty kawa surs of barley that man owes me. Not dawa surs'-which are smaller. Then he turned and was hanged without moving a muscle.

Another man, a Pathan, was being hanged when the rope broke. The warder bade him to go up on to the scaffold again, but "No," he said, "I was sentenced to be hanged, and hanged I've been!"

"Not so, friend," argued the warder. "You were sentenced to be hanged until you were dead, and you're not dead!"

It was a new view to the Pathan, and he t urned to the superintendent: "Is that right, sahib?"

'Yes, that's right."

"Very well. I didn't understand." he went composedly up the steps and was hanged again .- Youth's Companion.

The Victorious Life.

The Christiaan life may be viewed in many aspects. Types of Christian character are various. Of every truly Christian career, however, it may justly be said that itis a victorious life. The Christian is logically a victor; for the word Christian denotes one called after the name of and related to the Christ, or, as we might say, a Christman. And Jesus Christ is the great Conqueror of the human heart, the powers of darkness and the historic world process. which unites the soul of man vitally and dynamically with this Victor, Christ, is the overcoming principle of history.

The truly victorious life is triumphant in the moral sphere. Of mere physical prowess, of mechanical mastery over the forces of nature, of military domination, of political ascendency, the Bible makes but little. In its view the greatest man is not he who takes a city, but the man who wins his own soul by mastering it. Victory is first within, thence working outward. The victor spirit resists temptation, curbs appetite, abhors that which is evil, cleaves to that which is good, delivers its fellows from satanic bondage, builds up the kingdom of God .- New York Observer.

Deserves

Remarkable Success of a New Treatment for Piles.

For many years it has been supposed that the or absolutely sure cure for piles was by surgical option, but the danger to life and the pain and exper has been so great that many thousands suffer ; years rather than to submit to this last resort: they seek the temporary relief in the many rem dies claimed to relieve piles and rectal trouble salves, ointments and similar simple remedies whi give only slight and very temporary relief.

A new preparation which is painless and harmle

but which affords immediate relief and in ma cases a complete cure in a very short time, is so by druggists under the name of Pyramid Pile Con

It is in suppository form used at night and its re ular use has cured thousands of obstinate, lo standing cases, and it see as to be equally effecti in all the various forms of piles, whether itchin bleeding or protruding.

The Pyramid Pile cure allays the inflammati and intolerable itching, reduces the tumors, and astringent properties cause the enlarged blood we sels to contract to a normal healthy condition.

A Baltimore gentleman relates his experies with the Pyramid Pile cure in these words: "It affords me unusual pleasure to add my dorsement to those of others relative to your rea wonderful pile remedy. I was a sufferer for year until told by a fellow sa'esman of the Pyramid F Cure. J. BRECKENRIDGE ELLIS.

"What is the Advance Society?" inquires win Turner, Chicago, "and how do you t to belong to it, and when do you join, d all about it?" You can join at any time, d anybody can join. All you have to do to resolve five things: to read a verse in e Bible every day, and memorize a quotan from some standard author each week. ere you have two things; both of them e good things to resolve to do, are they t? Then you determine to read five pages history each week-a history you do not dy in school-and that only averages one ge a day, with Saturday to rest up, and aday to brace up, for the next dose. You e, if you do not ged into the habit of readg history, after you get older you will not re for that class of reading, and then you Il not be as cultivated and intelligent as u might have made yourself. Just think! ter you are a big man with boots, or a g woman without any perceptible buttons the back of your dress any more, then u will be a completed job. If you stored your mind while young, not with novels d gossip, but with the best literature, en you will be a good job. I hope all my aders will make good jobs out of themlves, for if you don't do it yourself, who Il? You see other people are tending to emselves, and they are all busy, and if you ant to be made good and smart men and omen, you will have to turn in and do it urself. So it's not the five pages of hisry that is so extremely important, but the ABIT of reading history. Well, we have ly named three things. Fourthly, you e to read 30 lines of poetry a week. Now this seems easy, but you would be perctly astonished to see how many members have, and how few of them get upon our onor List. Because, if you keep these resitions twelve weeks, your name is printed on our honor list. We have over a thousd members, from California to New York d Canada. Well, perhaps not sixty of is number reach the Honor List! What's e matter with 'em? Can't read five pages history a week! Already have their nds so spoiled with browsing on novels d stories and newspapers, that the very ought of poetry and history makes 'em k! Please take notice that I don't object good novels and stories. I write them self, and I wish everybody would read em (having first purchased the same). But x in something solid. Now I forgot to ention the fifth resolution; that is, to keep account of your work in a notebook dreport once a quarter. Now, Mr. Edwin, me and join us.

"I am a little girl 11 years old. I live ar Riverton, La. I want to join the Adnce Society, and my name is Susie Neal."

Mattie Maxfield, Carrington, N. D.: "I suppose the Av. S. is growing in members all the time. My brother and I carried on the resolutious twelve weeks last winter and were on the Honor List. This summer we moved from Illinois to North Dakota, where we live now and we did not get to read our verse in the Bible. We do not know how the story of the Red Box Clew ended and I would like to know very much, if you would please tell the members of the Advance Society that we would like to know how it ended and if some one of them would send us the clippings from the CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST from March 22, 1900."

Dover, Mo .: "We come again with our report, but not as we should, for we come with excuses. Sickness prevented me one day from reading my Bible; yes, too sick to read! And auntie says that during our August meeting that Bro. Fenstermacher held (which we enjoyed very much) she, too, failed to read her Bible one day. So all we can do is to promise to do better next time. My favorite quotation is from Chesterfield: "If you have but an hour, will you not improve that hour instead of idling it away?" I think the Advance Society is a great thing for us. Oh, it is so good and nice in you to take such interest in us! Some day you will receive your reward." (I receive all the reward I want, when I get a letter like this from one of our members.) "How we enjoy the stories and watch eagerly for the papers! I will close with best wishes for you and the Advance Society. Your little friend, Florence Belle Beattie. P. S .- Please suggest some little book of poems for us to read." (If you will write to John B. Alden, 393 Pearl St., N. Y., for a catalogue of his Elzevir Library, he will send you a list of little paper-back books, some of them little books of poetry, others, best selections, stories, essays, history, etc., and the price of these books is two cents and three cents each—the cheapest books I ever heard of. Now I get nothing for this advertisement of Mr. Alden's bookstore; he is no kin of mine; I never met him, nor any of his family. But I know about his twocent books, for I have many of them. But if price is no object to you, some splendid books of poetry for young people are the works of James Whitcomb Riley and Eugene Field, and R. L. Stevenson's "Garden of Child's Verses.")

During the next four weeks we will continue our story of "Pete." Ellen Dorser, White Lake, Fla., says: "Pete starts off just to suit me. The children talk just like lots of sure enough young people, don't they? And I know a little girl that likes to climb on fences and jump on hay just like Pete." And John Duvall, Wescott, Miss., says: "I think I know the mystery of that tramp that left a letter and a sack of candy in Pete's box in the yard. I think he is Miss Dollie Dudley's old lover that she was engaged to when she was young, but he got to be a tramp and now he is come to make mischief and he wrote to Pete's mother about it and she cried." Well, we'll see about that; may be he is and may be he isn't.

The Missouri Shorthand College of St. Louis Mo., is one of the Leading Shorthand Institutions in the United States.

Persons intending the acquirement of shorthand and typewriting s uld select a responsible school, otherwise their time and money are wasted.

As success in shor hand is largely dependent on the teacher as well as pupil, it is absolutely neces-sary that instructors should be practical shorthand writers, and no others are competent to teach.

The Principal of "The Missouri shorthand College" is John H. Schofield, the well-known journalist and shorthand writer, and member of the National Shorthand Writers' Association. In order to show that he is a practical and recognized exponent of shorthand, reference letters are herewith published from leading educators:

Prof. E. Benjamin Andrews, now Chancellor of Nebraska University, and recently Superintendent of Chicago schools, comments on his character and ability as follows:

Those so situated that they cannot attend school sessions, taught by mall, as Principal John H. Schofield has had gratifyin success by this method of teaching. Mail students who will devote two hours daily to practice, cannot fail to btain a general knowledge of shorthand in twenty weeks. This is a short time to acquire a proression that will enable persons to become el-supporting. Those who attend s ho I generally graduated in about sixteen weeks, but this depends largely on the ability and general knowledge of the pupil.

As a knowledge of shorthand is of no pracical utility unless able to sp Il and compose correctly, students deficient in these lines are taught without extra charge. PAUL THE MISSIONARY: THE SECRET OF HIS SUCCESS.

(2 Tim. 4:1-8.)

[Quarterly Missionary Meeting.]

Paul, in his advice to his young follower, Timothy, names the very things that had made him great as a missionary and a man.

First, "Instant in season and out of season." He was ready always to do what was given him to do; diligent, watchful, prepared to answer any call into Macedonia or the bounds of the West. Are all of us thus ready to serve at all times and in every kind of work?

Second, "Preach the Word." He confined his message to the declaration of Christ Jesus and all that pertains to him, which was his message; and refused to be turned aside to any other subject. The Word is the message for us to-day as well.

Third, "Reprove, rebuke, exhort;" in other words, make the message fit the hearers. Paint it so that it comes to hearts of to-day. It is possible so to preach the Word as to lift it clear back into the first century instead of making it apply to the nineteenth. Go at the lives of the very people who are before you, is the sense of Paul's exportation. As Spurgeon put it once, "Shoot to hit! And if no other missile will do, arm yourself into the gun and fire that at them!"

Fourth, "With all longsuffering." It is not always, perhaps, that the messenger, the missionary, whether in the comfortable American pulpit or in the foreign field, in the Sunday-school class, the Endeavor or the slums, is as longsuffering in dealing with those to whom he speaks as he should be.

Fifth, "And teaching;" that is, patiently, line upon line, precept upon precept, not expecting results in a moment. Who was the great preacher that declared it took two and a half to three years for him to implant a great idea in the people's minds? Shall the modern missionary expect to win the world in any less time than it took Paul to win a city?

Sixth, "Be thou sober." It is not always that the messenger lays aside all extravagance of speech and bearing and makes his message forceful by the calmness and sobriety of his own bearing. To be sober does not refer to abstinence from wine, but from many another thing equally intoxicating.

Seventh, "Suffer hardship." Few of us know what hardship is. It takes the missionary who can walk in the steps of Paul, who can endure perils by sea and land as he did to understand what it means to endure hardship. There are, nevertheless, certain little hardships that fall to our lot in our humble work. Some one slights or gives us, as we think, too little honor; some one assigns us a duty which we think beneath our capacity; some one laughs at our efforts or misunderstands our motives—shall we endure these little mosquito bites? What, then, would we do we confronted the stoning of Paul?

Eighth, "Do the woak of an evangelist." Paul never forgot that first of all his work was evangelistic—the winning of men and women by the gospel message. There was ever an end in view, and that end the saving of men.

Ninth, "Fulfill thy ministry." There was the personal ministration, the service to the individual in need, that was never to be forgotten. Is there any one who needs your ministry, fellow Endeavorer? What will you do, fulfill that ministry or neglect it? If you would be, like Paul, a successful missionary, it must be at the expense of steady ministering to the wants of others. The greatest missionary of them all came, not to be ministered unto, but to minister!

"I have fought a good fight, I have finished my course, I have kept the faith."—Paul.

The Growth of the Bible.

HERBERT L. WILLETT.

The Bible comes to us, not as a book written throughout like other books, by one hand, nor indeed do the books themselves come in regular order as we should suppose to be the case in such a collection. The Bible is really a library of sixty-six small volumes or treatises, composed for the most part independently of each other, but linked together by a clearly perceptible purpose, which makes the whole collection harmonious and progressive.

The books are not arranged in an order which gives to us a clear idea of their date. Indeed, the date of several of them is quite unknown, but in several instances we know that the order disregards entirely the sequence of time; for instance, some of the epistles of Paul are earlier than the gospels, and some of the minor prophets are earlier in their written form than the historical books like Kings and Chronicles.

1. THE OLD TESTAMENT. Apparently the growth of the Old Testament proceeded in some such way as this: The oldest portions, as we would expect, are those songs and poems from the distant past which tend to perpetuate themselves in the history of a people. Such hymns as the Song by the Sea (Ex. 15), the Song of Deborah (Judges 5), the Lament of David over Saul (2 Samuel 1) are among the early poetic products of this nation. Then we have the earlier records of the legislation interwoven with narratives of the past concerning the creation, the fall of man, the deluge and the distribution of the nations, forming the "Five Books of Moses," or the Pentateuch, which was regarded by the Jews as not only the earliest of the written books, but also the constitution of their national life. The book of Joshua, which is closely related to these five books, is sometimes added to this list and the whole is called the Hexateuch, or the "Six Books," dealing with the beginnings of the nation. The time at which these books received their final literary form, containing as they do some materials which happened subsequent to the life of Moses, it is perhaps impossible to assert positively.

The prophetic books are much clearer as to their dates, dealing as they do with the lives of men whose place in the history is evident, and containing as they do sermons or utterances of these men written down either by themselves or by their friends and disciples. The sequence of the prophets is comparatively easy to trace, beginning as it does with Amos and Hosea and proceeding on through Isaiah, Micah, Nahum, Zephaniah, Habakkuk, Jeremiah, Obadiah and Ezekiel, it comes to its close, so far as the definite records of the books are concerned, with Haggai, Zechariah and Malachi in the period after the restored community of Jerusalem. Such books as Joel and Jonah do not give definite record as to the time of their production. By some they are considered quite early, and by some much later than the books just named.

The Old Testament books of history, such as Joshua, Judges, Samuel and Kings are based upon earlier records, which are frequently cited in such expressions as:

"The rest of the acts of (naming the king), are they not written in the chronicle the kings of (either Judah or Isra) thus referring to court records or other d mentary evidence which was accessible to writer but has been lost. These narratives probably put into form during the period of Exile, for the books of Samuel-Kings for practically continuous narrative which closes the destruction of Jerusalem. The corresp ing books of Chronicles-Ezra Nehemiah, w form a continuous whole and cover the same tory from creation to a period contemporary the times of Alexander the Great (330 B. C) seen by the latter fact to be among the very writings of the Old Testament, though main use as they do of historical documents very n older, among which are to be found either narrative contained in Samuel Kings or an co one which the author of the latter had used

The Psalms contain a collection of hymns ging out of the religious life of Israel in all periods of its history. David himself is spoke as a singer and a psalmist, and many of the psare attributed to him. Whether all of the which the editors of the psalm collection I named as his were really composed by him i open question, but it is reasonably certain the book of Psalms in its present form arranged for the worship at the second tenthough it apparently contains psalms as lat the time of the Maccabæan struggle for i pendence in the second century before Christ

The wisdom books, which include Prove Job, the Song of Songs and Ecclesiastes, pre another phase of the Old Testament literat They are the products of the wise men, the phil phers or sages of Israel, and deal in a reflec manner with the problems of life, such as suc and failure, trouble and suffering, doubt and I The book of Proverbs is the national anthol upon the subject of making the most of life. passes under the name of Solomon for the rea that Solomon is known to have uttered many tentious sayings of this kind, and the wise me Hezekiah's court gathered a collection of prov believed to have been uttered by the great l To these were added collections, perhaps in l times, and thus our Book of Proverbs came form. The anonymous book of Job probably d from the time of the Exile or some later period depression, when the question as to God's pr dence was being raised by the suffering fait in Israel. It is the attempt of a pious and philosophic mind to answer the problem and dicate the character of God to a general growing doubtful under the stress of suffer The Song of Songs and the book of Ecclesis are perhaps later, the latter being apparently of the most recent of the Old Testament d ments. The book of Daniel is the one apocaly book of the Old Testament and apparently comm itself with the Maccabean uprising, while the book of Lamentations is a collection of ele relating to the fall of Jerusalem at the begin of the Exile or some later but similar experi-

Thus the Old Testament was formed gradually and one by one its materials came to be regarded as sacred by the Jewish community. It was commonly divided into three parts: the Law, that is, the five books; the Prophets, including the earlier historical books and the books of prophets from Isaiah to Malachi, with the exception of Daniel. and thirdly, the writings, including all other materials, such as the Psalms, the Wisdom books and the priestly history of Chronicles-Ezra-Nehemiah. The books of the Old Testament were written in the Hebrew character, with the exception of some of the later portions, such as nearly one-half of the book of Daniel, parts of Ezra and one verse of Jeremiah, which are written in Aramaic, the language which superseded the Hebrew as the accepted tongue of the Semitic world. The collection of the Old Testament was practically complete by the middle of the first century before Christ, as is evidenced by its translation into the Greek language, constituting the version known as the Septuagint, or the Seventy, from the fact that it is believed to have been made by seventy Jews at Alexandria.

Thus the Old Testament is the body of writings produced by holy men of Israel, not all of whom possessed the same degree of spiritual vision, but all of whom were guided in some true sense by the divine Spirit. Through these men God was leading the nation to higher levels of conduct and larger visions of truth, in preparation for the coming of Him who is not for one nation only but for all the world the Way, the Truth and the Life.

2. THE NEW TESTAMENT. The New Testament did not come into being in response to a deliberate literary impulse in the early church, but only grew up as the occasion gave birth to its various parts. The Christian community after the day of Pentecost took no thought for the writing down of Gospel narratives. They were preachers and not writers. In this they resembled their Master, who had written nothing. It is not surorising that the life of Christ, which constitutes the material of the first four books of the New Pestament, was comparatively late in taking literary form. The first writings of the church seem to have been the epistles of the leaders in the church to communities of believers who needed to strengthened in the faith. Some of those of Paul are among these earliest written products of the church. The same is perhaps true of the Epistle of James. This is as we should expect.

The dates of Paul's epistles are approximately as follows: The first group, 1 and 2 Thessaonians, about the year 52 A. D.; the second group, ncluding Gallatians, 1 and 2 Corinthians and Romans, about 57 A. D.; the third group, the pistles of the Imprisonment, including Philippians, Colossians, Philemon, Ephesians, dating from bout 62 or 63; while the fourth group, the pasoral, including 1 Timothy, Titus and 2 Timothy, come apparently in the period after Paul's elease from his first imprisonment. This period s, to be sure, conjectural and is denied by some piblical scholars, but there seem to be many evilences that Paul was released from his first Roma imprisonment and went out to other ministries, which are not recorded in the Book of Acts.

The Gospel narratives probably took form on the soil of Palestine from the lips of the apostles, who had been the personal companions of our ord. Among these Peter would naturally be one. The Gospel of Mark, which seems to be the earliest of the four, is believed to have been the written ecord of Peter's narrative concerning Jesus. Mark was a member of the Jerusalem church and loubtless a coworker of Peter's, and the book was probably published about 65 A. D. Matthew's lospel, which combines materials found in Mark with certain teachings of Jesus which the earlier Gospel had not recorded, probably stands next in the order of its writing, and dates not very far from the period of the fall of Jerusalem, 70 A. D. Still later was the Gospel of Luke, which was written as the introduction to the narrative of early Christian work which was embodied in the Book of Acts. The two are thus seen to be intimately connected and clearly by the same hand. They perhaps are to be dated not far from 80 A. D. The Book of Hebrews is an attempt to set forth the gospel in its relation to the Jewish law from the standpoint of one who was seeking to harmonize the two and adjust the gospel to Jewish minds. It seems to have been written very near the date of the Gospel of Matthew, or about the period of the fall of Jerusalem. Its author is unknown. The other writings include the general epistles of Peter and of Jude, and toward the close of the century we have the final work of John, whose Apocalypse is probably to be dated just before the fall of Jerusalem, while the Second and Third Epistles, the Fourth Gospel and the First Epistle constitute the latest utterances of the New Testament, and date from nearly the close of the first century.

These books, which thus grew up separately, probably without any knowledge on the part of their writers that others were likewise engaged, with whom they were closely related in spirit, were soon gathered up by the early churches, and in the second century already collections of the New Testament books began to appear. That they took the order which they preserve at the present time is not strange, considering the fact that the life of Christ was the foundation of all New Testament thought and teaching, and this was naturally followed by the narrative of the early church in the Book of Acts, and this in turn by the apostolic epistles, closing with one apocalyptic and prophetic book, the Revelation of John. This order was, of course, not intended by those who framed the collection as being chronological, but it is at least legical. This collection of books, so frank and human on the one side, is on the other so full of a divine quality in its spiritual tone and its note of authority that the centuries have conceded its right to be considered in a special sense the Word of God, a Word uttered indeed through human instruments, but none the less the revelation of the divine purpose through the life and ministry af our Lord, who not only while in the flesh but later on through the work of his apostles under the direction of the divine irit continued "both to do and to preach."

The New Testament accordingly grew through a series of years, appearing in its several parts as occasion demanded, presenting different aspects of our Lord's work and of apostolic teaching. Like the Old Testament, it shows the marks of the human hand which have wrought in its making, but not less the impress of the divine Spirit, guiding the apostles of Jesus into all truth needed by the church. Its inspiration is guaranteed, not alone by any claims which it makes for itself, but much more by its sublimity of thought, its nobility of purpose, its note of urgency and command, its inspiring power in the life of its students and its incomparable portraiture of that divine life which, though of the seed of David according to the flesh, was declared to be the Son of God with

PARABLE OF THE GREAT SUPPER.

This lesson follows immediately that of last week. One of the guests who dined with Jesus at the Pharisee's house, on hearing him talk so beautifully about feeding the poor, the maimed, the lame and the blind, broke out in the exclamation: "Blessed is he that shall eat bread in the kingdom of God!" The expression may have been sincere. Or it may have been but a complacent benediction which the speaker meant to apply only to such as himself and his associates at the feast. The latter is probably the case, for Jesus seems to speak the parable of the Great Supper in reply to what was in the hearts of the company. "He that shall eat bread in the kingdom of God" was to them but another way of designating the pious Jew, and above all the Pharisee. Who should be worthy of this honor, if not the children of Abraham? But Jesus would have them know that his kingdom was broader than any one nation, and that his mission was to the whole race of manking, and so he gives to them this parable.

A certain man made a great supper and invited many guests. Later, when repeating this parable in Jerusalem, as recorded by Matthew, Jesus says that it was a king who gave the marriage feast for his son. But the lesson is the same. It was customary to send the invitation some time before the day for the feast, and, when it drew near, to send a servant to call the invited ones to come. This was done, in the parable, but those who were invited made various excuses for not accepting. Business and social demands upon their time made it inconvenient for them to attend the supper, and the host saw that his feast was about to be with out any to enjoy it. Indignant at the treatment his invitation had received, he sent his servants out into the streets and lanes of the city, to bring in the wretched wanderers, who would so eagerly accept the offer of an abundant meal. This was speedily done, but the number of these was not sufficient to fill his great table, or to consume the ample provisions he had provided. So he sent his servant out into the highways and along the hedges, telling him to compel every beggar and loiterer to come, that his house might be filled. He ended his instructions by declaring that none of those who had spurned his invitation should taste of his supper.

The meaning of this parable must have been apparent to the haughty Pharisees and scribes. The blessings of the kingdom of the Messiah they were wont to express under the figure of a feast. To this they counted that every Jew was invited, while from it every Gentile was excluded. All the glowing pictures painted by the prophets, all the rich imagery in which was set forth the glory of the Messiah's reign, they appropriated to themselves. Theirs were the privileges of the chosen people, and the whole history of divine providence they deemed but a preparation for the coming of the Messiah to occupy the throne of his power and glory in the midst of the nations. After all this opportunity for preparation, they ought to have been ready to accept the gracious call, and pass in unto the feast. John the Baptist had come as a special messenger from the Lord, declaring "the kingdom of heaven is at hand." To his urgent call the leaders of the chosen people had turned a deaf ear. They were too busy with their worldly affairs, too engrossed with their subtle speculations garments and ceremonies, to answer the call to spiritual pursuits. They did not want the Gospel. It was above their level of thought and desire. It is even so to-day. Men care more for lands and oxen, for gold and silver, than they do for salvation. To many, the pleasures of the home, or those of society, which ought to be hallowed by a Christian aim and spirit, become a barrier between them and the Lord. The dear Lord is still wounded by receiving in answer to his loving invitation the ready and flippant reply, "I pray thee, have me excused."

But, if the leaders of the chosen people would not accept his invitation, the Master knew that there were those who would. The outcasts in the streets of the city, the publicans and sinners, against whom the doors of the self-righteous were shut,-these would welcome the friendly hand reached out to help them. So the call came to them, and eagerly they hearkened unto it, insomuch that the Lord became known as "the friend of publicans and sinners." As the sick seek the hospital, the starving run to where food is freely given, so these dying creatures heard with joy the welcome news that there was grace for them. They were Jews, but outcasts from the favor of their own nation. Given often to the practice of vices of impurity and fraud, their chief offense in the eyes of the Pharisees, perhaps, was their neglect of the external forms of religion, upon which these zealots laid the chief stress. It galled the rigid partisans of the ceremonial law to see these pariahs, or outcasts, who neglected the synagogue worship, paid scanty tithes, and often showed but slight regard for the Sabbath, welcomed into the presence of the Nazarene, and treated with utmost kindness and pity. They ought to have remembered that the physician's mission was to the sick, and not to the well; that the Messiah was to be the Savior of sinners, and that he must therefore seek them out and deliver them. Their own greatest prophet, Isaiah, had told how that the Christ should bear the sins of the world, and how could he do this unless he stooped so low as to get beneath this mighty burden? Yes, the publicans and sinners must be his guests.

But heaven's grace does not stop here. Outside the city gates, far away upon the highways, where men travel round the earth, hiding under the hedges, were the despised Gentiles, little better than dogs in the estimation of the haughty Pharisees. Though they knew not God, and had long bowed down to the idols that their own hands had made, they were yet his children. Traces of his image might still be seen in them, by any one whose spiritual sight was not corrupted by sin They, too, must be called in to the feast, for was it not the Father's table that was spread there? When the messengers of the cross met with scornful refusal at the hands of the Jews, therefore, they promptly turned to the Gentiles, saying, "God hath granted unto the Gen-tiles repentance unto life." Blessed grace of God, which leaps all barriers of land and sea, of race and tongue, of sin and folly, and brings to the lost everywhere the tidings of divine love! Let us go out into the highways and hedges, and constrain them to come in.

A COMMON TROUBLE

Thousands Suffer From it Without Knowing its Real Character.

No trouble is more common or more misunderstood than nervous dyspepsia. People having i think their nerves are to blame, are surprised that they are not cured by nerve medicines and spring remedies; the real seat of mischief is lost sight of the stomach is the organ to be looked after.

Nervous dyspeptics often do not have any pair whatever in the stomach, nor perhaps any of the usual symptoms of stomach weakness. dyspensia shows itself not in the stomach so much as in nearly every other organ; in some cases the heart palpitates and is irregular: in others the kidneys are affected; in others, the bowels are troubled, with loss of fiesh and appetite, with the accumulation of gas, sour risings and hear burn,

Mr. A. W. Sharper, of No 61 Prospect St., Indianapolis, Ind., writes as follows: "A motive of pure gratitude prompts me to write these few lines regarding the new valuable medicine, Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets. I have been a sufferer from nerv ous dyspepsia for the last four years, have used various patent medicine and other remedies without any favorable results. They sometimes give temporary relief until the effects of the medicine wore off. I attribute this to my sedentary habits being a bookkeeper, with little physical exercise but I am glad to state that the tablets have over come all these obstacles, for I have gained in flesh sleep better and am better in every way. The above is written, not for notoriety, but is based on actual

CURES BALDNES

Trial Package Free to Convince People It Grows Hair.

MISS EMMA EMOND.

The portraits of Miss Emma Emond show what a striking difference is made in a person when the bald head is covered with hair. Miss Emond was totally bald, the hair follicles not only upon her head but upon her eyebrows being completely contracted, not the sign of a hair being found. Of course she was the object of many experiments, all of which failed, and the offer of a well known D spensary to send a free trial of their remedy was peculiarly alluring to her. She sent for the free trial, followed all directions faithfully, and soon trial, followed all directions faithfully, and soon she was rewarded by a growth of hair, which, for thickness, quality and luxuriance, was as remarkable as the result was gratifying. Miss Emond lives in Salem, Miss, at 276 Wa hington St, and naturally feels very much elated to rec ver from total baldness.

Those who are losing their hair or have parted with their locks can have it restored by a remedy that is sent free to all. A Cinsinnati firm has concluded that the best way to convince people that hair can be grown on any head is to let them try it, and see for themselvas. All sorts of theories have been advanced to account for falling hair, bit, after all, it is the remedy we are after, and not the theory. People who need more bair, or are anxious to save what they have, or from sickness, dandruff or other causes have lost their hair, should at once send for a free trial package and learn for themselves that their hair can be quickly restored.

The rem dy also cures itching and dardruff, sure signs of approaching baidness, and keeps the scalp healthy and vigorous. It also restores gray hair to natural color, and produces thick and lutrous eyebrows and eyelashes. By sending your name and address to the Alteanelm Medical Dispensary, 1707 Butterfield Building, Cincinnatt, Onio, enclosing a 2 cent stamp to covr postage, they will mal you prepaid a free trial of their remarkable remedy, together with testmonials from th usands who have used the remedy, and all information necessary to help you in quickly regaining your hair.

Book Notes.

During the past few months we have made some great book offers, but we feel that we have sur passed ourselves in our offer of "The Home Library -see second page of this issue. Fifteen splen did volumes for $5 00 is an offer that is not made every day. Turn to the full description, read the offer carefully, note what books we are offering and then hasten to send in your order. Remem ber that this offer positively expires November 1 The time is short. What you do must be done quickly. Fifteen volumes for five dollars is 331 cents per volume-a marvellously low price for handsome, cloth-bound books, new and in firstclass condition.

Our "Biographical and Historical Library" has made a sensation—as well it might. We are receiving more orders for it than we expected. The people are marvelling at the offer-as well they may. Our stock of these volumes is not yet exhausted, and the offer remains open until November 1, provided the books are not all gone before that time.

We are preparing a new edition of "The Christian Worker." A flood of orders for this valuable preachers' manual has exhausted our stock, but in a few days we will again be prepared to meet all demands for it. Meanwhile we beg the indulgence of our patrons. This book is undoubtedly the best work of the kind ever issued. It contains practical aid and suggestions for every phase of the minister's work. No preacher, pastor, evangelist or church official can afford to be without it. The price is but seventy-five cents.

Our new General Catalogue, on which work is rapidly progressing, will be a thing of beauty. It will be, among other things, a portrait gallery of the prominent men of our brotherhood, containing fine half-tone cuts of many of our leading preachers and writers. The catalogue will not be ready for delivery for some days yet, but if you will drop us a card now, we will send a copy to you-freeas soon as issued.

"Thirteen and Twelve Others," by B. O. Aylesworth, which formerly sold for $1.25, has been reduced to sixty-five cents. It is a volume of thirteen stories. These stories are attractive, realistic and clean. They are fiction, but fiction of a helpful and elevating kind. The author displays an enviable talent as a teller of tales and the book will prove a valuable addition to the family or Sunday school library.

"The Miracles of Jesus," by A. A. Willits, was originally published as a subscription book. It is a volume of 528 pages, splendidly bound in cloth, with illuminated cover and gilt edges and contains 130 fine illustrations. This valuable book had a large sale at the original price of three dollars, but we are offering it, postpaid, at the exceedingly low price of $1.20. We have only a few copies and when these are gone this offer will be withdrawn.

Few books published by us have had a larger sale than "The Care of all the Churches," by Thomas Munnell. It is a volume of great practical value to every preacher, church officer and active Christian. It contains chapters on "Apostolic Supervision," "Disordered Congregations," "Work of the Pastors, Preachers and Elders," "Work of the Deacons," "Conditions of Success," "Sunday-school Work," etc., etc. The volume contains 292 pages and is bound in cloth. It now sells for Seventy-five Cents.

CURRENT EVENTS.

President Mitchell, of the United Mine Workers of America, has called a convenion of the anthracite miners, to be held at cranton, beginning on Friday, the 12th inst. he object of the convention is to decide vhether to accept or to reject the 10 per ent. net increase in wages offered by the oprators. The fact that such a convention has een called is regarded as certain proof that he miners are disposed to accept the propoition. It is possible, however, that other onditions may be introduced that will deay the termination of the strike for a little vhile. A 10 per cent. net increase is a deided victory for the miners, and it is not robable that they will reject this offer. All of the coal operators have now conceded his advance in wages. The country genrally will rejoice to see the strike ended, nd especially by a concession to the miners which will decidedly better their condition.

The fact that Germany has yielded the oint of demanding of China the surrender f the leaders in the Boxer rebellion, as a ondition precedent to peace negotiations, as apparently removed one of the most erious obstacles to the co-operation of the Powers in the settlement of the Chinese uestion. This concession on the part of bermany was made the easier because of he edict of the imperial authorities of China legrading Prince Tuan and indicating a burpose on the part of the Chinese governnent to punish the leaders in this rebellion. Peace negotiations will be delayed, however, by the refusal of the Chinese imperial court o return to Pekin after a persistent effort on the part of the Powers to induce them o do so. Instead of this, their imperial majesties have taken their departure from the Shanshi Province, where the conditions were said to be distressing on account of the scarcity of food supplies, for Shenshi, which is about three hundred miles further from Pekin. The reasons for their refusal to return to Pekin are "the presence of the allied forces there, and the fear entertained of the outbreak of epidemic diseases which usually follow after great disturbances."

Notwithstanding the probability of agreement between the Powers in their dealings with China, there seems to be no reversal of the policy of this government to remove the larger part of our military forces in Pekin to the Philippines. In doing so the government does not by any means intend to abandon its legitimate part in settling the difficulties with China. It believes that peace negotiations will be facilitated by this policy. This feeling is not shared by the Americans resident in China. At a meeting of American citizens at Tien-Tsin the following resolution was adopted:

We, citizens of the United States, deplore the contemplated withdrawal of a large part of the United States troops in North China. We feel the work of the allied armies is far from accomplished. and that the refusal of the American Government to take its part therein is sure to be regarded by the allies as an unworthy act, and by the Chinese as a sign of indifference. We urge our government to carry to an end the work it has so honorably and efficiently begun, and to maintain a sufficient force here to secure the protection of American mercantile and missionary interests until a settlement of the present trouble is accomplished."

In addition to the foregoing action of the Americans in China, the following resolutions have been adopted by practically all the Americans who were besieged in Pekin, at the suggestion of United States Minister E. H. Conger. These embrace missionaries who have been for a long number of years in China. After speaking of their interest in the reformation of China, and explaining that the recent movement has forced native Christians into a false position, with the alternative of massacre or apostasy, they

- 1. That those who are found to have been leaders in this anti-foreign movement be adequately punished.
- 2. That the native Christians be indemnified for the losses of life and property which they have suffered in this persecution.

We urge the necessity of insisting upon educational reform in China:

- 1. By the abolition of the present literary test of merit in the civil service.
- 2. By the introduction in its place of branches of Western learning.
- 3. By the discontinuance of the worship of Confucius and a compulsory educational rite.
- 4. By placing all Chinese, irrespective of religious beliefs, upon the same footing in matters of educational privileges.

We ask for a radical revision of the civil and criminal processes in China, with a view to securing justice and equal rights for Christians by such readjustments as shall secure:

- 1. That all Chinese, irrespective of religious belief, shall be placed upon the same footing in all proceedings in the courts.
- 2. That officials shall receive such salaries for services and such punishment for bribery as shall tend to do away with the present corruption of courts.
- 3. That all temple rites, worship and idolatrous rites, as a condition of holding civil and military office, be abolished.
- If these reforms can be accomplished, we believe that the welfare of the Chinese people will be promoted and that better relations will be established between the Chinese and foreigners.

We are also of the opinion that, in claiming indemnity from the Chinese Government, adequate allowances shall be made:

- 1. For loss of time caused by the Boxer disturbances.
- 2. For all traveling expenses, including those to and from foreign lands, which have been incurred through these disturbances, and the order of the government to missionaries to leave China.
- 3. For the future rise in prices of building material and labor.
- 4. For rent of premises until new ones can be built
 - For literary work destroyed.

Dr. Koch, the celebrated Berlin scientist and bacteriologist, who has been conducting scientific investigations in German colonies for a year past, announces to physicians at Hong Kong, where he has arrived on his way home, that he has discovered means of preventing the spread of malaria in malarial districts, and even of stamping out the disease itself. He has been conducting experiments in this line in New Guinea, where large numbers of natives die yearly of malaria. It is said that Dr. Koch's treatment consists of giving patients a medicine he has discovered, the chief ingredient of which is quinine, not simply for curative but preventive purposes. He has also found a method of expelling the malarial parasites, the chief among which is the pestiferous mosquito. No details of his method are given, but the Doctor gives it as his opinion that the total extirpation of malaria is possible. He has left physicians in New Guinea to carry on the work, while he will complete his investigations in his Berlin laboratory. If Dr. Koch's opinions and hopes can be realized, he will have achieved a victory far more important than most of those which have been gained upon the field of battle. The world is greatly indebted to the patient, persevering researches of scientists for the discoveries which ameliorate the suffering of mankind and promote its health and happi-

The results thus far of the election in England vindicate the political sagacity of the Conservative leaders in appealing to the people at this time. It is now known that the Conservatives will be retained in power with increased majorities and that the imperialistic wing of the Liberal party has received additional force at the expense of the opposing wing. Meanwhile the war in South Africa seems to be practically ended. Lord Roberts, it is said, will soon issue a proclamation of peace on the anniversary of the outbreak of the war. He is expected himself to return to England shortly, having been appointed to the position of Commander-in-Chief of the British army. This honor was conferred upon the veteran commander on his sixty-eighth birth day as a gift from the government. He has served in the army for nearly half a century, having passed through all the grades of military distinction from the lowest to the highest. It is not yet known who will succeed him in South Africa, but it will probably be General Buller or Lord Kitchener.

Bishop McFaul, of the Roman Catholic Church, of Trenton, N. J., recently put forth a proposition for the federation of all Roman Catholic societies in the United States, with the view of securing their rights, as he terms it, in the political administration of the country. Accordingly last week in Brooklyn there was held a convention of the Roman Catholic Young Men's National Union. Bishop McFaul's proposition was the chief subject of discussion. It was held that Roman Catholics are discriminated against, and the Indian School question was instanced as evidence of this. The looting of Roman Catholic churches in the Philippines was again charged, though the charge has been denied even on Roman Catholic authority. It is very difficult for our Roman Catholic friends to understand the complete separa tion of Church and State as we have it in this country. No other religious body, so far as we know, is clamoring for its share of the political offices of the country. Inagine a convention of the Disciples of Christ, Methodists, or Baptists, or Presbyterians, or Congregationalists, complaining that they were discriminated against in that their members were not elected or appointed to political offices in proportion to their membership! This would be so un-American that no Protestant body would think of it. In the meeting above referred to, it was regretted that no Roman Catholic had been appointed a member of the Philippine Com-Who but Roman Catholics have mission. interested themselves to find out what religious bodies are represented in the Philippine Commission? We do not know which of the denominations are represented, neither do we care. If we mistake not, the people of this country will resent any organization whose object is to press the claims of any ecclesiastical organization for its share of political offices.

Now that the Indian famine has been practically ended, though its painful sequels have not, by the advent of the long withheld rains-too copious, indeed, in some parts-an instructive account of things done and not done is being taken. Perhaps the most impressive fact that appears is the contrast between the activity of relief work proceeding from Christian sympathy and the neglect or refusal of succor by Hindus well able to contribute to their perishing countrymen. Hinduism has it missionaries laboring to propagate it in this country and elsewhere in Christendom, it is right that the contrasting facts should be stated. America has contributed a million dollars to the sufferers. Germany has also contributedwe know not how much. British charity, though heavily taxed in the South African war, has given $1,700,000. The Government of India has spent $65,000,000 in relief work. The Viceroy and other British officials have given freely. A few of the native princes and rulers have given large sums. On the other hand the educated, English speaking Hindus have held aloof .- The Outlook.

A HEAVEN-SENT MESSAGE.

On the eve of assembling once more in National Convention, there comes to many of us the message which God sent to His people of the first century by the pen of Paul, and which He has repeated to His people of the closing days of the nineteenth century through the lips of that consecrated man of God, A. M. Atkinson, uttered with his dying breath. It came to us under circumstances so unique, so solemn, so impressive, as to be permanently imbedded in the memory of not only those who heard it, but of all those with whom he stood religiously identified.

In the midst of a great historic gathering of the Disciples of Christ, convened in an historic spot to celebrate a half century of missionary activity, there stood up one whose life had been, in a most striking manner, consecrated to the service of God and his fellowmen; a man who had given liberally, not only of his money, but of his time, of his business ability, of his mental and physical energy. yea, of his very life, to what he believed to be one of the holiest and tenderest ministries in the kingdom of God. He spoke of his own experience; he uttered a word of warning to the rich; he appealed to them, and to all his business brethren, not to deprive themselves of the enlarging and enriching influence of Christian liberality and Christian service. He closed his impassioned appeal to his brethren, whom he loved so well, by placing one hand over his heart, and lifting the other toward heaven, and exclaiming: "I cannot be with you long. Be warned. 'Quit you like men!" " And then, taking his seat, he fell back with his white face turned heavenward, whither his spirit fled to meet

It was a glorious ending of a noble life, nobly consecrated to noble ends. The words quoted above, uttered after death had struck him, and in full consciousness of the approaching end, may not only be considered his message to his brethren, but God's message to us through him. It is peculiarly appropriate that we should be reminded of this message and its import as we are gathering once more in National Convention for the furtherance of those great interests which lay so near to his heart.

"Quit you like men!" Surely the times demand those qualities which are deemed so essential in a true manhood—heroism, breadth of vision and far-sightedness, and strength of character to resist evil and to carry forward successfully great enterprises which look to the extension of Christ's kingdom in the world, and the elevation of mankind.

Religious movements, like individuals, have their periods of childhood, with the characteristics peculiar to that period; and their period of manhood, with the elements that characterize that stage of development. We are not yet very old, as a religious movement seeking to accomplish certain great objects, chief among which are the restoration of certain lost features of the Christianity of the New Testament, and the unity of Christ's followers; but we have passed the period of childhood, and can no longer plead the irresponsibility which attaches to youth and immaturity. We are old enough have had experience enough, and are large enough, to have attained the elements of true manhood above mentioned. If we be found lacking in any of these elements, we stand justly condemned, if not before the bar of Christendom, certainly before the bar of our own consciences, for having failed to make that growth which time, opportunity and the favoring providence of God have made possible.

With ut the heroic quality we shall turn back, or at least halt, in our efforts to accomplish some of the reforms which are needed in the Church to-day. It requires heroism of a high order to resist and overcome opposition to change, when change is necessary to progress. Inertia is one of the greatest obstacles to religious reform Faint-hearted men see spooks and ghosts, and turn back from doing the work which God wishes done. They see giants and walled cities, and conclude that it is impossible to go up and possess the land, even though God be our leader.

For lack of vision the people perishbreadth of vision and length of vision. The former insures against narrowness, bigotry, uncharitableness, wrangling over trifles, division, decay and death. The latter saves us from aimlessness, superficialness, and that folly which sacrifices permanent success on the altar of a present, temporary and doubtful triumph. Miraculous gifts may be necessary for the childhood period of Christian development, but a spiritual manhood exercises faith, hope and love, and these abiding qualities are what give breadth of sympathy and vision, and that far-sightedness which lays hold on the true goal of life.

Strength is also an essential quality of manhood without which the difficult tasks of life cannot be accomplished. We are old enough, and have been taught of God enough, to be "strong in the Lord and in the power of his might." Here is the true source of our strength. If we are strong in our convictions of right and truth and duty, strong in our faith in God, and in his willingness and ability to enable us to carry out whatever work He wishes to have accomplished, then we are ready to achieve results worthy of Christian men.

These are the spiritual qualities of Christian manhood which our departing brother exhorted us to exercise. If we are inclined to grow faint-hearted because of the obstacles which are in the way of progress; if we allow ourselves to be diverted from the great purposes for which we have been called into being, and to fritter away our strength and our influence on petty issues; if we are lacking in that manly quality of strength, and find ourselves unable to cope with the difficulties and tasks that lie before us, then we are not quitting ourselves like men, but are become as those who, having the age of manhood, are suffering the results of an arrested spiritual development.

But, beloved, we are persuaded better things concerning you: things which make for progress, for achievement, and for ultimate triumph. But we do well to remember, in the midst of our great national convocation, and continually, the true and timely admonition, the divinely-sent message, from our ascended brother: "Quit you like men. Be strong!" His benignant face will not be seen in our convention, as in years gone by, but his spiritual presence and power will be felt in this loving message, and we shall be braver, broader and truer men and women because he lived, and because, "being dead, he yet speaketh."

THE MEANING OF A VOTE.

We print elsewhere in this issue an article by Prof. Herman S. Piatt, of the University of Illinois, which is in the nature of a stricture on some recent editorial utterances in the Christian-Evangelist. The article is exceedingly well written and its courteous spirit will commend it to all who believe in fair discussion. Disclaiming, as we do, the designation of "partisan Prohibitionist," which, by implication, our critic applies to us, we nevertheless desire to point out what seems to us some flaws in the logic of the article.

- 1. We should be far from affirming that all Christians who do not vote the Prohibition ticket "have their Christian consciences atrophied by party predjudice—or from even worse causes having their origin in party devotion." On the other hand our critic would scarcely deny that there are altogether too many voters—aye, too many Christian voters whose consciences are atrophied by partisan prejudice, or from some other cause. Anything, therefore, that can be done to quicken the conscience of the average voter, we are sure he will deem as quite legitimate. So far we agree.
- 2. Exception is taken to our statement that "a vote is an expression, as we view it, of one's highest and truest convictions concerning public duty." This is called "the fundamental error of the Prohibitionists, as it is of many other high-minded and wellintentioned people." In opposition to this view he holds that since the government is conducted by agents whom the people select, and that "voting is the act by which we select these agents," therefore, voting is only partially and secondarily an expression of conviction, and that "primarily it is an act." We fail to see any antithesis between the positions that a vote is an expression of one's conviction of public policy, and, that it is an act. It is both. An act is the way one's real convictions express themselves. Again our critic says, "its purpose is not to express a conviction, but to do something -to carry on governmental processes." Again we fail to see the antithesis. ever a voter, by his ballot, expresses a noble and true conviction concerning pending issues, he does something, and something that is worthy of a Christian voter, and that something also has to do with "governmental processes." What a vote does it does because of what it expresses. The real question is, Ought a Christian man by his vote to give an expression of his conviction concerning "governmental processes," even though he feels reasonably sure that he will be found in a minority by so doing? To deny this seems to us to take all high ideals out of politics and reduce our elections to the level of what some of our politicians call "practical politics"—which is politics minus ethics, as a rule.

- 3. A reductio ad absurdum is then resorted to to fortify the previous statements. The case supposed is that if the "considerable number of voters in this country who have a conviction that things would be vastly improved if all our public servants were men so imbued with the principles of apostolic Christianity that all their official acts would express fully those principles" should decide to organize themselves into a political party and nominate candidatesshould we vote for them in order that our votes may represent our highest and truest convictions? We doubt if there is any "considerable number of voters in this country" who would wish their public servants to enforce Christian precepts and principles by the machinery of civil government. This, therefore, cannot be what our correspondent means. He must mean that there are voters who believe that the principles of Christianity, such as righteousness and honesty, should be carried into public life and influence public action. But there are no voters that would take issue with such a position. The reductio ad absurdum, therefore, does not reduce, being absurd upon its face. General principles must take some concrete form before they can become issues in politics. Prohibitionists believe that the moral principles of Christianity, in this campaign, are chiefly embodied in the concrete issue concerning the liquor-traffic.
- 4. The illustration from history concerning the action of the Gold Democrats is not one that will carry conviction to all minds. It depends upon the point of view. Our critic says, "the Gold Democrat had the option of voting for principle and against party, or against principle and for party." He did not so regard it. He evidently believed that to vote for free silver on the one side, or for some of the Republican principles on the other side, would be alike against principle, and he declined to do either, and so made a party of his own. The argument on this point, and throughout the article, seems to be based on the adage, "Of two evils choose the less," but there is a revised reading which we like better: "You have heard it said, of old time, between two evils choose the less; but verily I say unto you choose neither." This course is more obviously correct when, between the two admitted evils, there is some reasonable doubt as to which is the less.
- 5. The example of organized labor is referred to as furnishing an object lesson for Prohibitionists. Not to mention the fact that there is a labor party headed by Mr. Debs, as its presidential candidate, there is a lack of similarity in the conditions which robs the object lesson of much of its force. Since both of the older parties are vying with each other in their profession of zeal for the cause of labor, as our critic says, there is much less excuse for the organization of a distinctive labor party than there is to organize a Prohibition party, since neither of the parties expresses the slightest sympathy with Prohibition, but, on the contrary, are all known to be opposed to it. Things which are not equal to the same thing are not equal to each other.

- 6. We hope it is true, as Professor Piatt declares, that "there are enough people in this country who hate the saloon to blot it from civilization." We would be glad to believe, too, that "there are even enough voters in the Prohibition party now to secure what the party is striving for, if the forces were properly wielded." We do not contend, for a moment, that the Prohibition forces of the country are being wielded to the best effect. We have realized for many years that the Prohibition party does not rally to its support all those who are opposed to the saloon. If Professor P. can tell us how this defect can be remedied, he will prove himself a benefactor of the race. So far as we are concerned, we are not so committed to the Prohibition party that we would not leave it to-morrow for a more effective method of opposing the saloon and its baleful influence. Our friend's advice, no doubt, would be for Prohibitionists to remain with the old parties and do their work there. We fail to see, however, that those enemies of the saloon who do remain with their parties are making any serious protests against the encroachments of the liquor power. If one would ally himself, therefore, with those who are making an active, aggressive campaign against this gigantic curse, the enemy alike of the state and of the church, he is driven to the necessity, as it seems to us, of voting with the Prohibitionists. He may feel that other issues are of more practical importance and so vote with one or the other of the leading parties. But if his conscience leads him to deposit a ballot where it can be counted unmistakably on the side of temperance, sobriety and of freedom from the liquor oligarchy, what else can he do? If some plan which promises to be more effective in opposing the saloon than the Prohibition party is, can be devised, we are ready to give it our hearty adhesion.
- 7. Finally, it seems to us that Professor Piatt, in his well-written article, underestimates the practical value of lifting up high ideals before the people. He counts that vote lost which is cast for a party that has no hope of carrying the present election. This, we know, is a common view, but it seems to us an essentially erroneous one. It takes the heroism and idealism out of politics, and makes it too largely a scramble for office. We doubt if the Republican party would ever have been born under the inspiration of this utilitarian spirit. There are causes so noble, so linked with the highest interests of humanity, that it is well worth while for one to be identified with them even in defeat, for the defeat of to-day often means the success of to-morrow. When the Galilean Prophet laid down his life for a cause that was hopelessly in the minority, the politicians of that day, no doubt, smiled in derision at his mad folly. But the cross, which was then the emblem of shame and ignominy, has become the highest insignia of honor, and the cause which was then derided and spurned by philosophers and ecclesiastics is to day marching on to universal conquest. If Christian people do not lift up the banner of reform high above the platforms of place-seeking politicians, noble in its ideals and righteous in its aims and principles, who else will do it? And without it, how can our nation realize the magnificent destiny for which it was intended by the God of nations?

hour of Prayer.

WHAT HATH GOD DONE FOR US?

(Psalm 126.)

(Prayer for our National Convention.]
[Uniform Midweek Prayer-meeting Topic, Oct. 17th.]

CENTRAL TRUTH: It is a good thing to remember what God has done for us lest we forget to be thankful to Him and cease to look to Him for guidance and strength for further achievements.

"When the Lord turned again the captivity of Zion, We were like unto them that dream.
Then was our mouth filled with laughter,
And our tongue with singing."

It must have been a memorable day in the history of Israel's captivity in Babylon, when the news was spread among them that the king had issued a decree permitting them to return to Jerusalem to rebuild its walls and restore its worship. It seemed almost too good to be true. They were like people in a dream who fear to wake lest the glorious vision which filled their mind be dispelled. They must have taken their harps from the willows where they had hung them, and tuned them for some of the sweetest songs of Zion, under the inspiration of the joyful news that their long captivity was about to end. As the patriot in exile longs for his native country, so these patriotic Jews longed for the vine-clad hills of Palestine, and for their beloved Jerusalem. And this patriotic sentiment was intensified by their religious devotion, for they refused to sing the songs of Zion in a strange land. And so their sorrow was turned to joy, and their mourning into laughter at the good news that the Lord had opened the way for their return to the land of their fathers.

Even the heathen took note of their rejoicing and the cause thereof, and said among themselves, "The Lord hath done great things for them." To this Israel responded:

"The Lord hath done great things for us; Whereof we are glad."

The remembrance of this divine interposition in their national history causes the Psalmist to cry out:

"Turn again our captivity, O Lord, As the streams in the South."

These lines would indicate a condition of spiritual declension from which the Psalmist prayed they might be delivered. And then, gathering hope from Israel's past experience, the Psalmist sings a note of cheer which has brought courage to many a fainting heart in hours when there seemed to be little outward signs of religious prosperity:

"They that sow in tears shall reap in joy.

Though he goeth on his way weeping, bearing forth the seed.

He shall come again with joy, bringing bis sheaves with him."

This was often verified in Israel's history, and it has often been verified in Christian history.

Let us look at our own history as a religious movement: What hath God done for us? We were once in captivity to human creeds. and under the dominion of religious errors which filled our souls with gloom and doubt; but it pleased God to break the chains of our captivity and set us free, so that to day no galling yoke of human authority in religion oppresses us, and no false conception of God's way of dealing with men keeps us upon the rack of perpetual doubt and fear. The joy and gladness that came in with the light of this Reformation is, perhaps, little appreciated by the generation of to day. Souls which had long been wrapped in clouds of despondency, groping their way in the dark, seeking God if haply they might find Him, when they first heard the plain, simple way of the gospel proclaimed as it was preached in apostolic times, broke forth into thanksgiving and praise that they were at last permitted to "read their title clear to mansions in the skies." Religion had always been a puzzle to them, but now the way seemed clear. Christianity was not the mastering of a human creed with its metaphysical and speculative doctrines, but it was believing on Christ and following Him. Why had they not seen it before? But now that they did see it, they rejoiced with a joy unspeakable and full of glory.

The Lord has not only given us liberty, but he has given us a goodly zeal for the truth, a remarkable evangelistic zeal for the conversion of sinners, and a rapidly increasing missionary zeal which is sending out the glad tidings, not only to the dark places in our own land, but to far-off pagan lands. He has increased our numbers until we are more than a million strong. He has given us men of eminent ability and consecration. He has given us a standing and an influence in the religious world which makes it possible for us to accomplish greater results in the future than we have in the past.

At our forthcoming Convention in Kansas City there will be encouraging reports made of the work accomplished by our three great missionary organizations: The American Christian Missionary Society, the Foreign Christian Missionary Society, and the Christian Woman's Board of Missions. Besides these, the Board of Church Extension and the Board of Benevolence and the Board of Education will make reports showing the extension of the different lines of our work.

Aside from what we have accomplished directly, much has been accomplished indirectly in the new impetus that has been given to Christian unity, to a revival of Bible study, and to a more enlightened presentation of the gospel. When we stop to think of all that God hath wrought through us, and remember how imperfect agents we have been in carrying out His will as He has revealed it to us, there can hardly fail to come to each of us a deepened sense of responsibility and of humility. What could not God accomplish through us if we would but give curselves unreservedly to Him, to be the embodiment of His truth and the instruments for carrying forward His work of reform in the world!

Let us pray that the coming Convention may witness a renewed consecration to the great work to which God has called us, and may summon the vast army which it represents to a forward movement both for the conversion of sinners and for the edification of believers, so that they may grow up into all the fullness of the divine life.

PRAYER.

We thank Thee, O God, for what Thou hast done for Thy Church universal in calling it out from the world to be the chosen instrument for manifesting Thy grace and truth to a perishing world. We thank Thee truth to a perishing world. for what Thou hast done for us as religious reformers, seeking to restore Christianity to its original simplicity and power, and to unite Thy people according to the prayer of our divine Lord, in Him, and to the end that His kingdom may triumph over all. We thank Thee for all that has been achieved in the past in spite of our mistakes and short-comings, and we pray Thee that we may be so filled with Thy truth and Thy spirit that we may accomplish much greater things in the years to come. Bless all the assemblies of Thy people for the furtherance of Thy work in the world, and may Thy people come more and more into the unity of the faith and of the knowledge of the Son of God, until the whole earth shall be filled with Thy glory! And thine shall be the praise, through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen!

Editor's Easy Chair

Looking out from the office window a little while ago, we saw some fresh green leaves on an elm tree, and suddenly the feeling of spring came to us; but at once we remembered that this is autumn. A visitor to this planet from some other sphere might mistake these green leaves and the bright, warm weather as evidences of approaching spring, but every denizen of the earth knows that, in this latitude, at least, there is a winter to intervene between this and another spring. This is the fixed and unchangeable order of nature. There is a physical order in the world which we must recognize and to which we must conform, or else we are crushed by it. Recognized and obeyed, this material order is a great blessing to mankind. Ignored and disobeyed it would soon work the destruction of the race. But there is a moral order in the world as well as a physical order, the existence of which can no more be doubted than we can doubt the reality of a material order in the course of nature. A certain course of life brings peace, joy, moral development and fulness of life. An opposite course brings misery, failure, moral deterioration and death. The reason of this is that in the one case the moral order of the world is recognized and obeyed; in the latter it is slighted and disobeyed. To prevent the destruction of man by the violation of this moral order, it was written originally in man's moral constitution, and later it was embodied in commandments inspired of God and engraved on tables of stone. Human law, also, whenever it enters the sphere of moral action, is supposed to be an index to this moral order, though unfortunately it frequently deviates from it, partly because the depraved mind of man fails to discern clearly what the moral order is, but more especially because the depraved heart is unwilling to erect so high a standard of moral conduct for itself as that given in the law of God. More and more, however, human governments, laws and constitutions are being conformed to that moral order which rules throughout the universe of God.

The most distinctive mark of Christ's religion, and one which distinguishes it more than anything else from all other religions of the world, is its power to renew man's nature, to quicken his conscience, to vitalize his whole moral nature and make it the regnant power in his life. Men fail morally. not so much through lack of knowledge of what is right as through the lack of power to live up to their ideals of right. This is the great conflict described by Paul in the seventh of Romans. But as the work of spiritual disenthrallment goes on, the Christian becomes more and more a free man in Christ Jesus, until he no longer does the right, or conforms to the moral order, through the external power of commandments, but by the inward, impelling power of love. When one reaches this state he is no longer "under law but under grace"; but until he does reach that state, he is under law, no matter in what dispensation he lives. Paul labored to bring his converts into this largeness of Christian liberty in which they would become the servants of righteousness, not by the power of external commands, but by the power of an endless life within them. working out that which was well pleasing in the sight of God. This is still the ideal toward which we are to struggle. It is far better for one to perform his religious duties because they are duties, and their neglect would bring pain to the conscience, than not to do them at all; but this is not the highest ideal of religious life. When it becomes our delight to do those things which are wellpleasing in the sight of God, and they are well-pleasing to us for the same reason that they are well pleasing to God, namely, because they are right, then we have attained unto true Christian liberty. Many of us think we know something of this sort of religious life at times, at least, but there are other times and seasons when most of us have to fall back on the motive of duty. Sometimes about the only real, genuine prayer we can offer is, that we may be forgiven for our lack of any desire to pray, and of any delight in communion with God. Often prayer thus begun ends in real thankfulness, and in a spirit of devout gratitude to God for his goodness to us. And so it is that the spiritual is above the moral and furnishes the vital power by which our morality is the free, spontaneous expression of the life that is within us. This it is that makes the difference between Christianity and legalism, between freedom and slavery.

But leaving now this lofty table land of contemplation, up to which we were led by the green elm leaves in October, let us descend to something more obvious and, perhaps, more practical. The time is nearly at hand for starting to the National Convention at Kansas City. If an additional word be needed to convince any wavering ones that they ought to attend the convention, if it is within their power to do so, we would like to speak it. We ought not to weigh over against such a privilege, with all the spiritual experiences and influences growing out of it, a few paltry dollars, or a little bit of inconvenience. Whatever contributes to the enlargement of the spiritual life, to the quickening of our faith, to bringing us in touch with the world's needs, so as to draw out our sympathies, our gifts, our prayers, our activities for the elevation of mankind, is not to be compared with silver and gold, nor with luxurious ease and comfort. These latter belong to the ephemeral things of the earth that soon pass away, but the former partake of the eternal, and add to the inheritance which fadeth not away. There are hours in one's life in which one feels more, sees more of spiritual realities, and lives more, than in whole weeks and months of ordinary, humdrum life. The influence of such hours never leaves us. We are always richer for them. No one who goes to the Kansas City Convention with an open mind and heart, entering fully into the fellowship, the devotional atmosphere and into its great ideas and purposes, can fail to be permanently enriched in his spiritual life and better prepared for the work which he has to do. One feels stronger when he comes to realize what a mighty host there is of those who stand with him, fighting the same battles under the same banner. Ex President Harrison said at the Ecumenical Conference in New York, last spring, that during our Civil War, when the Union army was marching south of Atlanta, Ga., the various brigades and divisions had been hidden from each other by intervening forests and underbrush, until one day they came out into one of the broad savannas or prairies, and the whole Federal line came suddenly into view with their burnished arms flashing in the sunlight and their banners floating in the breeze. When the soldiers saw the far-extended battle-line moving forward together under the same great leader, a mighty shout went up from them, and they moved forward with quickened pace, with renewed energy and with more buoyant hopes when they saw what a mighty host they were. Something like this will be the effect of the great gathering at Kansas City upon dispirited soldiers of the cross who have been working in isolated fields against great odds. These will join in the triumphant songs which will be sung there with a greater joy, perhaps, than any others. Let us go and greet them and encourage them. Let us go with such open minds and hearts that we may both receive and impart inspiration, and returning home, scatter the influence of the convention far and wide. So shall the whole church be revived.

Questions and Hnswers.

- 1. In the witness of the Spirit that we are the children of God, is the evidence always confined to the Word? Or does the Spirit impart a knowledge of our sonship in some other way?
- 2. Is there any sense in which repentance may be said to precede faith? M. M. S.
- 1. We think the Holy Spirit does, in addition to the testimony through the Word, give to the obedient believer a consciousness of peace and joy and love, which the believer is able to recognize as the fruit of the Spirit. In this way he is assured of his relationship to God in a way which would not be possible on testimony wholly external to himself.
- 2. Yes, repentance toward God may precede faith in Jesus Christ. Every man is conscious of having committed sin, independent of the fact of his belief in Christ. He knows he is the subject of a moral government, whose laws he has disobeyed. To repent of these sins because of one's belief in a moral governor is repentance towards God and is often the best preparation for faith in Christ. Repentance in such cases, however, is based on a preceding belief in the existence of God, whose law has been disobeyed and hence, psychologically speaking, belief in something or some one necessarily precedes repentance. But, as we have said, repentance may spring from a belief in God before there is opportunity for faith in Christ. In ordinary experience we are not able to distinguish between belief in God and belief in Christ, for we have always heard of them together, but this was not the case with the Jews of Christ's time who were commanded to repent in order that they might believe the gospel, nor is it the case now in heathen lands where men have a conviction, more or less clear, of the existence of a Supreme Being who requires right action, before they have ever had opportunity of learning the fulness of his revelation in Jesus Christ.

What is your explanation of the faith and prayer healing done by John Alexander Dowie, of Chicago, Illinois, of which we read in his paper, "Leaves of Healing?" A. H. H.

The same principle, in our judgment, underlies all the cures effected by Dowie, by the Christian Scientists, by magnetic healers, by Spiritualism and whatever other modern fad is in the healing business. Diseases of a certain type yield to the influence of the mind upon them, and whoever can inspire confidence on the part of those thus afflicted that he could heal them, has the power to alleviate their pain and in some cases to effect what seems to be a remarkable cure. Some of these healers attribute it to animal magnetism, some to faith and some to the metaphysical influence of the healer on the sick. John Alexander Dowie has found his scheme to be exceedingly profitable, and he has accumulated vast sums of money from the people who are credulous enough to believe that he, like Simon Magus of old, is the "great power of God." regard him as an impostor whose influence, as far as it extends, will prove disastrous to Christianity.

WHAT IS A VOTE?

HERMAN S. PIATT.

EDITOR CHRISTIAN-EVANGELIST.—Dear Sir:-In your issue of September 13, you give, at some length, in response to the query of a correspondent, your reasons for intend. ing to vote the Prohibition ticket at the coming presidential election. Your statements are eminently candid and fair. I believe them to be representative of the views of the sincerest and most intelligent of the partisan Prohibitionists. It is not my purpose to make a reply to that reply. That could come appropriately only from the correspondent himself. But I desire, if you will allow me the space, to indulge in some general observations suggested by your remarks and by others which have come to me from other Prohibition sources.

First, let me say that I do not affiliate with either of the so-called older parties. I have voted for Republicans, Democrats and Prohibitionists, as considerations of Christian duty and the largest public good seemed to me to require. My excuse for the intrusion of this personal note is that it is the stock assertion of the partisan Prohibitionist that professed Christians who do not vote with him have their Christian consciences atrophied by partisan prejudice—or from even worse causes having their origin in party devotion. To vote as one prays is, to most Prohibition orators at least, synonymous with voting the Prohibition ticket.

"A vote," you say, "is an expression, as we view it, of one's highest and truest convictions concerning public duty." This is the fundamental error of the Prohibitionists. as it is of many other high-minded an I well intentioned people. Rather it is one of those partial truths which, coming from persons in high position who think, do infinite harm among the many who do not think. Let us see a moment. The government of this country is based upon the theory that every man is in himself a sovereign ruler. As regards the laws, every citizen is both legislator and executive. But the number of these rulers is so great that practically it is impossible for each one to exercise his sovereign power directly. Therefore he selects agents who shall do his will for him. Voting is the act by which he selects these agents. A vote is, then, in a way, an expression of one's "convictions concerning public policy." But it is that only partially and secondarily. Primarily it is an act. Its purpose is not to express a conviction, but to do something-to carry on governmental processes. The first question for the voter at any given election, then, is not, what will my vote express, but what will it do?

Let us look at it from another side. Suppose we try a reductio ad absurdum. There is doubtless a considerable number of voters in this country who have a conviction that things would be vastly improved if all our public servants were men so imbued with the principles of apostolic Christianity that all their official acts would express fully those principles. I certainly share such a conviction. What shall we do? Does any one propose to organize such voters into a political party and nominate candidates, so that our votes will represent our "highest and truest convictions"—but will do nothing else? Verily the author of such a proposition would at once be classified with the individual mentioned by the psalmist who said in his heart there is no God.

After the proof an illustration. I shall take it from history. In the campaign of 1896 there was a large number of Democrats who believed that the maintenance of the gold standard in this country was a matter of supreme importance. Whether they were right or not is of no moment here. The lines between the parties on this question were clearly and sharply drawn. gold Democrat had the option of voting for principle and against party, or against principle and for party. It was an alternative from which the best of us would shrink. Little wonder then that he shirked the choice. He created candidates of his own. so that he might have an opportunity to express his "highest and truest convictions" by his ballot. In so doing we can only commend his heart, but condemn his head. In the light of his own beliefs it was a mistake. The Gold Democrat should have first determined within himself which for the moment he regarded as most consequential for the welfare of the country—the triumph of the gold standard or the triumph of the Democratic party. If he decided for the former, he should have voted for Mr. McKinley; if for the latter, he should have voted for Mr. Bryan. In trying to save both party and principle he sacrificed both. As a matter of fact, every Democratic vote given to Gen. Palmer in 1896 was, in its effect, a vote both against the Democratic party as a party and against the gold standard.

It will doubtless be objected that this is an illustration which fails to illustrate, inasmuch as the situation of the Prohibitionist is quite different from that of the Gold Democrat in 1896. The latter part of the objection is true. The illustration is only intended to show how full of pitfalls and serious error is the attempt to make a vote first of all an expression of convictions.

This leads us to a consideration of the Prohibition party as a practical solution of the liquor problem. It is a lamentable fact, as you declare, that the political parties of this country are afraid to antagonize the saloon interests and are not afraid to antagonize the anti-saloon interests. Why is this so? Is it because more people in this country believe in the saloon than do not believe in it? If so, then Prohibitionists would better quit organizing political conventions and appointing candidates for office, and begin organizing missionary societies and appointing preachers. But it is not so. No one for a moment doubts that these who are aggressively opposed to the saloon are more numerous than those included in what are called the saloon interests. Why, then, are the latter a dominating factor in political affairs, while the influence of the former is practically nil? It is because the children of this world are wiser in their generation than the children of light. The saloon people are far too shrewd to separate themselves from the forces and instrumentalities which really make the political history of this country. They prefer to work with them, or rather to use them. Suppose the liquor men should form a political organization to themselves and nominate their own candidates for every election, how long would they continue to wield influence in other political conventions than their own? The saloon man is for any candidate and for any political party that is for his interests. If in a given election none are for him, he lies low and bides his time. While he is biding he is not idle. He is a loyal Republican or Democrat on all questions except those pertaining to the saloon; on these he is a saloon man. His devotion to party is sincere, but he regards saloon interests as higher than party interests. How long shall we be learning wisdom from our enemies?

Organized labor furnishes another objectlesson to Prohibitionists. It has organized no political party. It has utilized the political forces already in existence. It has had no candidates of its own creating. It has worked quietly, persistently, hopefully. It has been content with small gains frequently made. What is the result? Our statute books are sprinkled with laws passed at the instigation and for the benefit of organized labor. The politician courts it. Not a political convention dare fail to recognize it. And candidates outdo one another in protestations of devotion to its interests. It has not vet secured all it wants nor all it should have. But it is getting both and no one has any doubt of the final outcome.

It is true, as you say, that the Prohibitionists are now able to hold the balance of power between the two older parties. But what does it amount to, since it is not used? A single regiment may hold the balance of power as between two closely matched armies. But it will amount to nothing unless they get into the fight. There are enough people in this country who hate the saloon to blot it from our civilization. There are even enough voters in the Prohibition party now to secure what the party is striving for, if the forces were properly wielded. But in order to accomplish their purposes they must be wise as well as steadfast. They must labor efficiently as well as zealously. They must love the Prohibition cause better than they do the Prohibition party. They must utilize the forces and means at hand rather than create new ones. They must be patient. They must be content with the half loaf, pending the securing of the whole one. And even the dry crust must be appropriated with gratitude when the half loaf is beyond reach.

There is another phase of the question which is worth noting in closing. The Prohibition party is made up for the most part of our very best and purest citizenship. At present its members amount to practically nothing as a force in our political life. Some 200,000 voters, representing our highest and noblest Christian manhood, are thus withdrawn from any real participation in shaping our national affairs, and are as if they did not exist. Is not the injury done, by their absence, to the cause of a purer and better political life in this country far greater than any good they have thus far done to the cause of Prohibition? Even the most partisan Prohibitionist will surely admit that there are other moral questions pressing upon us, which demand for their proper solution the unity and co-operation of all the good people of the land.

HOW WE GOT OUR ENGLISH BIBLE.

BY CARLOS C. ROWLISON.

It is said that when the Revised Version of the English New Testament appeared in 1881, a deacon exclaimed, "If the Authorized Version was good enough for St. Paul, it is good enough for me." To-day every well-informed Sunday-school scholar knows that the Old Testament was originally written in the Hebrew language and the New in the Greek; but comparatively few, even of the better educated, know the story of how the Bible which is in all of our homes came to us from the hands of those who wrote it. This paper will try to tell the story.

- 1. By the year 150 B. C. all the books of the Old Testament had been written, and probably all the books of the New Testament by A. D. 100. But they were not printed and bound in one volume as our Bible is to day. The art of printing was not invented until the fifteenth century. Before that time each copy of a book had to be transcribed by hand. So, many times the whole of the Bible would not be transcribed in those early days, but only one book, or a group of books which were especially desired. These were written on parchment (see 2 Tim. 4:13) or vellum, the latter being dressed skin and much more durable than parchment. But after awhile these books were collected into one volume, and we have three Greek manuscripts, which contained the whole Bible, written about A. D. 350 to 400. These are the oldest copies of the Greek Bible that we have, though there are many others of later date.
- 2. But in ancient times, as to-day, everybody could not read Greek, so it was necessary to translate the Bible into the languages of the various peoples. (For a list of translations, see McGarvey's "A Guide to Bible Study-Appendix," of the Reading Courses.) Now the most important of these ancient versions is the Latin. It is the most important because the Latin, or Roman, Church became the teacher of Western Europe. During the darkness of the Middle Ages people forgot how to read Greek and the old Greek manuscripts were lost or stored away in some ancient monastery. One of the oldest of them was discovered only about half a century ago in a monastery on Mount Sinai. Thus Latin came to be the only language spoken or read by the educated people of Europe, and many of these so-called educated people knew so little that they supposed the whole Bible had been written originally in the Latin. This Bible is called the Latin Vulgate, and is a revision of a more ancient Latin version, the revision having been made by St. Jerome about A. D. 400 in a cave at Bethlehem. He was bitterly persecuted for presuming to revise the Bible, but after awhile people became accustomed to Jerome's version and thought it had been inspired!

3. But do not suppose that every one read this Bible as people are supposed to do to-day. Only a few people could read in the Middle Ages, and besides the priests said the Bible was too sacred for the common people to read. Even to-day Roman Catholics are opposed to people reading the Bible. In ancient times the priests knew very little of what the Bible taught, but three especially important influences worked together to put the Bible into the hands of all the people in the language which they spoke every day, though this was not accomplished entirely until after many years, and until many had suffered greatly for daring to do such a thing. These influences were (1) The revival of learning and the founding of universities; (2) the revolt against the papacy, generally called the Reformation; (3) the invention of the art of printing. The first led men to the careful study of the Scriptures and caused them to revolt against the corruption of the Roman Church; the second caused the Reformers to translate the Bible into the language of the people so that they might learn the way of salvation for themselves, and might also see the errors of Romanism; while the third made it possible for many people to have the Bible in their own hands, as thousands of volumes could be printed in a short time. If we stop to think how long it would take to write carefully each copy of the Bible by hand, we can readily see how great a blessing printing is.

4. In England there were several early attempts to put Bible stories into language so simple that people could understand them. Cædmon turned many of these stories into a poetic paraphrase about A. D. 680. Even Alfred the Great translated portions of the Scriptures, so anxious was he for his people to know their contents. But the first important English version was made by John Wycliffe, a professor at Oxford and a popular preacher. He was one of the very first to revolt against the papacy, and he suffered great persecution, though he was still pastor of his little flock when he died in 1384. Forty years afterwards his bones were dug up and burnt, and his ashes thrown into the river. His translation was made from the Latin Vulgate, he being unable to read either Greek or Hebrew, even had he had access to them. Nor was printing yet invented. Yet at least parts of this Bible were copied many times and read with great eagerness by the people, many of whom suffered martyrdom, being burned with the copies around their necks. In the preface of this old Bible runs this prayer: "God grant us to ken and to kepe well Holie Writ and to su er joiefulli some paine for it at the laste.'

About 1540 the printing press of Johann Gutenberg proved a success, and the Latin Bible was printed thereon. About the same time men began to study ancient manuscripts, Greek and Hebrew especially, which had for a century or two been drifting to Western Europe from the Eastern monasteries. The study of these opened the eyes of scholars to the e rors of the old Latin version, while it greatly deepened their interest in the teachings of the Scriptures. Martin Luther was born in 1482; William Tyndale in 1483. The one translated the Bible into German, the other into English. Luther's version is the copular Bible of Germany even to-day. Tyndale's version was such a noble translation that every succeeding version is little more than a revision of Tyndale's. Mr. Froude says, "The peculiar genius which breathes through the English Bible, the mingled tenderness and majesty, the Saxon simplicity, the grandeur, unequaled, unapproached in the attempted improvements of modern scholars-all are here, and bear the impress of the mind of one man, and that man William Tyndale." This is doubtless rather fulsome praise, but it indicates the truly remarkable work of the translator. Perceiving that if he disseminated translations in England his life would be endangered, he went to Germany, finally joining Luther at Worms. He published several editions which were widely read. He was at last entrapped and suffered martyrdom.

Space will permit only the mention of two or three other versions prepared about this time, though all of them do little more than transbribe much of Tyndale's translation. The first of these is the version by Miles Coverdale, the first complete English Bible ever printed, 1536; Matthew's Bible, 1537; Cranmer's Bible, or the Great Bible, 1539. The last was authorized by the king, commended by the clergy, and placed in every parish church for the instruction of the people, and this, too, only three years after Tyndale's death! The Geneva Bible, published by the English exiles in Geneva, 1557-1560, is the first Bible with chapter and verse divisions.

5. But now the time of persecution for the translation of the Scriptures is over. King James caused to be selected fifty-four learned men, chosen from all the religious parties of the day, besides securing the cooperation of every biblical scholar of note then in his kingdom. These scholars now had access to Hebrew and Greek manuscripts of the Scriptures, and special instructions were given to correct any mistakes of former translations. The revisers were divided into six companies, each of which took its own portion. They used every means to arrive at the exact sense of the original, and then gave great care to express this meaning in simple, idiomatic English. After seven years' work, they, in 1611, presented to the king the result of their labors. It is called the Authorized or King James' version because King James ordered it done. It is sufficient to say that the work was so well done that for nearly two and a half centuries no one could be found to suggest a revision. This is the Bible which we often call the Common Version, and which is found in almost every home where the English language is spoken, whose simple, beautiful words have strengthened us in trial, comforted us in sorrow, given to almost every book of our language many most suggestive phrases, and which is constantly quoted and read by un-

6. After such a translation we find people saying even to-day, Why was the new version necessary? Several reasons will be enumerated: (1) To-day many ancient manuscripts and versions are accessible to scholars which were unknown to the translators of 1611. These show that several errors had crept into the Bible (though very few indeed compared to the errors found in the ancient classics) during the long years in which it was copied by hand, and when scholars were so slightly acquainted with the ancient languages. See, for example, John 5:4, 5, margin Revised Version, which indicates that most ancient authorities omit the passage put in the margin.

(2) The science of textual criticism (that is, the comparison of many copies of Scripture which have been discovered in the last century and the annotation of likenesses and differences) has entirely sprung up since

(3) Our scholars are far better acquainted with the ancient languages and with ancient thought and customs than were the translators of 1611.

(4) By natural growth the English language has changed the meaning of many words, while some have entirely fallen out of use, in 300 years. For these and many other less important reasons, a new version was undertaken in 1870, of which the New Testament was completed in 1881, and the Old Testament in 1885. A large company of scholars, selected from all the denominations of England, assisted by a similar company in America, spent three long years in the most careful revision of our Bible. The Old Testament company contained 37 English and 15 American scholars; the New Testament company, 30 English and 19 American scholars, making a total of 101 Whether or not this revision will revisers. take the place of the Common Version in our homes and churches remains to be seen. That it gives much more exactly the meaning of the original Hebrew and of the words of Christ and the apostles, no scholar can question. Every one should possess a Revised Version and read it carefully before he decides which Bible he will constantly

ROGER WILLIAMS AND RE-LIGIOUS LIBERTY-III.

W. H. ROGERS.

Very soon after his arrival in Boston in 1631, Mr. Williams was called to the First Church in Boston. Learning that the church in Boston was not a Separatist church he refused the call.

He had fled from the unseparating churches in Old England, why should he become the pastor of an unseparating church in New England?

He took this stand with a full understanding of the cost of Separatism. He had suffered. There was a Separatist church in Salem, and he accepted their call. But the Governor and Council prevented the consummation of the plan for a permanent settlement there, and Mr. Williams accordingly very soon became the pastor of the Separatist church at Plymouth. Gov. Bradford states that Mr. Williams' teaching at Plymouth was approved-that he was a godly and zealous man, "having many precious parts" but very "unsettled in judgments."

He remained at Plymouth two years, at the end of which time he was recalled by the Salem Church, which meantime had lost something of its fear of the magistrates, and none of its esteem and love for its former pastor. Bradford, fearing the consequences of Williams' Arabaptist tendencies, advised him to accept the recall to Salem.

Meantime, Williams had further troubled the magistrates with a treatise which questioned the validity of their patent, and matters hastened rapidly to his banishment, which occurred on Oct. 19, 1635.

The people believed in Roger Williams and would have followed him implicitly but for the magistrates, for whom some consideration must be shown also; for it cannot be doubted that Williams' boldness in moving along the line of his convictions seriously endangered something which the magistrates very naturally, and perhaps at that time wisely, sought to conserve, namely, the favor and protection of the English government.

The radicalism of Williams needed the check which was imposed by the conservatism of the Puritans and by the Pilgrims also to some extent. God had to watch both parties to the conflict, and by an overruling hand, centripetal and centrifugal forces were wisely balanced in the interest of the wisest outcome.

The indictment against the accused included the following charges as to his teach-

- 1. That the magistrate ought not to punish the breach of the First Table except when civil peace should be endangered.
- 2. That the oath ought not to be tendered to an unregenerate man.
- 3. That a man ought not to pray with the unregenerate, even though it be with his wife or child.
- 4. That a man ought not to give thanks after sacrament nor after meat.

Strange issues and absurd, as looked upon from this distance, but not so incongruous for the year 1635, and issues for the existence of which Roger Williams was little more responsible in 1635 than is William Rogers in 1900; certainly no more responsible for them than were his persecutors. These issues were the outgrowth of the times, and in Roger Williams' mind they were entirely subordinate to the one allabsorbing, paramount issue-the principle of spiritual freedom, untouched by the power of the magistrates; and the interference on their part, of which Mr. Williams had been the victim, only intensified his devotion to that principle. Every other tenet or principle which Williams may have advocated or opposed was but as a corollary to his main proposition: Civil and Religious Liberty. That his corollaries were always logical will not be claimed.

Roger Williams had his quips and quirks Many a time has it happened that men have been very wise in general and very foolish in particular, but that he was right on the main proposition the world now knows, and he is worthy to be called the Apostle of Religious Liberty.

History has and will vindicate his claim here. That he refused to fellowship his wife has never been proved. Hubbard and Winslow discredit it, not to say that they deny it. His enemies sometimes may have trapped him into absurd positions, and in those dawning days of religious liberty what wonder that the outlines of some truths that were kindred to the great, preponderating theme were seen very indistinctly.

If occasionally Williams proved overbearing he could not have been more so than Luther when he declared that Erasmus was "the vilest miscreant that ever disgraced the earth!"

Well, the court had serious misgivings about the sentence of banishment they imposed. John Cotton, the greatest preacher of that time, whose blood ran in the veins of Oliver Wendell Holmes and Phillips Brooks of our day, John Cotton, I say, protested that the sentence was passed without his counsel or consent, a protest which Williams never admitted.

Winthrop, who was also in a measure accessory to the banishment, hastened to give Williams a hint not to be there when Capt. Underhill came with his pinnacle to ship him to England—and Williams wasn't there, as Rev. Mr. Merriman has so patly put it.

Winthrop also used his influence afterwards to have the banishment revoked.

As late as 1875 the Massachusetts General Court was weightily petitioned to revoke the banishment, but the petition was futile. Again, in this year of our Lord 1900 the General Court was petitioned and was about ready to take favorable action, when in one of the Boston libraries there was found a memorandum, the purport of which was that in 1676, while Williams was still living, the banishment was revoked.

The members of the court generally believed that such was the case, and hence the matter was dismissed. It turns out, however, that the revocation, so-called, of 1676, was by no means a tona fide revocation. There is, however, at present a movement in contemplation, if not already under way, to secure a statue of Roger Williams in Boston, and this by legislative enactment. That it will be consummated at no distant day there is no reason to doubt, and then Roger Williams will be back again in the commonwealth from which he was banished in 1635-that is his memory will be perpetuated here before the eyes of men by a living monument.

It has been said that the poetry of Milton concerning freedom was translated into prose in the founding of the New England col nies. If that be the case, then Roger Williams, the friend of Milton, was, as it is fitting that he should be, the first among the translators.

It took nothing less than a New England commonwealth to give expression to Roger Williams' idea of religious liberty, and for the first time in history we see in Rhode Island a form of government adopted in which the line between the temporal and spiritual power is clearly and unmistakably drawn. And Little Rhody stood for some time an anomaly among the nations. Rhode Island never persecuted Quakers or hung witches, and in Rhode Island no man was ever officially persecuted or punished for his religious opinions.

But if my readers will indulge me in one more article, I wish to do full justice to those Puritans who banished Roger Williams. There are two sides to all questions.

THE FOREIGN CHRISTIAN MISSIONARY SOCIETY.

A. MCLEAN.

The Foreign Christian Missionary Society was organized in Louisville, Ky., Oct. 21, 1875. Its agents are now found on four continents and in eleven different countries. The growth of the Society has far exceeded all that its founders dared to ask for or think. The income for the first year amounted to $1,706.35; for the last year it was $180,016.16. The first year twenty churches contributed; last year 3,067. The second year of the Society's existence two Sundayschools contributed. The Sunday-schools began to give before they were asked. Children's Day was first observed in 1881. That year 189 Sunday-schools responded: last year 3,260. The whole amount received from the first from all sources is $1,472,-603.85. Of this amount about $250,000 has been invested in property on the fields. The Society has received from bequests $96,351,-91. The largest bequests were received from Mrs. Emily Tubman. Abram Farewell, Albert Allen and John Stark. Mrs. Tubman's bequest amounted to $30,000. It is the largest the Society has ever received. The amount received from this source has been used to open up new stations. On the Annuity Plan the Society has received $92,240. Most of this has been put in buildings on the field.

The Foreign Society has sent out from the first, or employed on the field, 162 workers. Some of these died, a few have returned on account of ill health or for other reasons. At the present time our whole force numbers 257. Of these 111 are missionaries and 146 are native evangelists, teachers and helpers. The stations and out-stations at which they work number 113. Seventy-nine churches have been organized. Schools have been established, hospitals, dispensaries and asylums have been opened. About 50,000 patients are treated annually. Great numbers of tracts and gospels have been distributed. The aim of the workers is to commend the gospel to the hearts and consciences of all with whom they have to do.

For seven years after the Society was organized its work was all done in Europe; this from necessity and not from choice There were no men ready to work in the heathen fields. The Society called for such men, but there was no response. There were men ready for Turkey, for Denmark, for France and for England. Rather than do nothing it was thought advisable to send them. Good work was done by them, but it was not the work for which the Society was organized. Its original purpose was to work in the needy fields of Asia and Africa.

In 1882 a group of missionaries was sent to India. Their going caused much thanksgiving and rejoicing. The people manifested their approval by giving twice as much that year as the year before. G. L. Wharton, Albert Norton and their families, and four young ladies from the Woman's Board constituted the first group. On reaching India they selected the Central Provinces as their field. We are now working in India at four main stations and six or eight out-stations. The work has five branches, namely, the evangelistic, the medical, the educational, the literary and the benevolent. The gospel is preached far and near. The missionaries go out on long tours through the towns and villages; children are being trained for lives of usefulness and nobleness; orphans are rescued, and in the industrial schools they are being taught trades and prepared to support themselves. At three of the stations there are medical missionaries. These treat each year about 30,000 people. In the time of famine thousands of meals have been given out. The missionaries are the agents of benevolent people all over the world, and in addition, of the government of India. Grain is sold for food and for seed. Other necessaries of life are given to them.

The Society began its work in Japan in 1883. The pioneers were George T. Smith and C. E. Garst and their families. They left the crowded foreign concessions for the interior. Their example did much to cause other missionaries to spread out over a larger territory. Our missionaries now live in Tokio, Osaka, Sendai and Akita. In addition there are some thirty-five out-stations. These are visited as often as the missionaries can find time and strength.

China was entered three years after Japan. Dr. Macklin was the founder of the mission. He established himself in Nankin. He was soon joined by two young men from the West London Tabernacle, and by E. T. Williams and F. E. Meigs and their families from this country. The chief places at which the Society is at work are Shanghai, Nankin, Lu Cheo Fu, Chu Cheo and Wuhu. In Nankin the Society has a large hospital and two dispensaries. There is also there a college for boys. F. E. Meigs is the president. There is a training school for girls under the care of Miss Emma Lyon. The gospel is preached in the chapels and dispensaries, in tea houses, in the temples and on the streets. James Ware and W.P. Bentley and their families live in Shanghai. They preach and teach and disseminate Christian literature. W. R. Hunt and Dr. E. I. Osgood and their families are in Chu Cheo. T. J. Arnold, C. B. Titus and their families and Dr. Butchart are in Lu Cheo Fu. C. E. Molland and family and Miss Effie D. Kellar are at Wuhu.

The Society has a station several hundred miles up the Congo, at a place called Bolengi.

There are three missionaries there, E. E. Faris, Dr. Royal J. Dye and wife, Frank T. Lea and wife are in the Portuguese territory; they expect to join the others soon. At Bolengi there is a school of 132 pupils. Regular services are held at the station, the gospel is preached along the rivers. There is a daily clinic where large numbers are being treated.

Last fall L. C. McPherson and Melvin Menges and their families sailed for Havana, Cuba. They report 15 baptisms. They give much of the time to the study of the language. They also preach to the people and the soldiers and the sailors who understand English. In June of the current year Abram E. Cory and family left for the lawaiian Islands. This work was begun at the expense of Lathrop Cooley, of Medina, Ohio.

The Foreign Society is an international organization. The churches and Sunday-schools of Canada have contributed regularly from the first. Miss Mary Rioch, of Japan, is supported by the women of Ontario and in the Maritime Provinces. Within a month the Endeavorers of Ontario have furnished funds for a dispensary at Chu Cheo, China. The English women support Dr. Mary McGavran and Miss Clark in India, and send large amounts each year for the general work. Australia supports Miss Mary Thompson, F. E. Stubbin and three native helpers in India.

The expenses of the Society from the first amount to about eight per cent. of the gross receipts. As money is worth more in America than it is on the mission fields, a dollar reaches the field for every dollar given. If the money needed was sent into the office without any expenditure on the part of the Society it could be handled for less than one per cent. The Society must establish agencies, it must keep up a campaign of education. It is this that costs.

The great need of the Society is that of men to serve as evangelists. There is no lack of women; to apply where one can be sent out. Suitable men are very scarce. Of all the graduates of our colleges last year not one applied for an appointment. The professions of law and medicine are crowded. Vacancies in the army and the civil service are satisfactorily filled—there are fifty applicants for every vacancy. It is not so with the mission fields. It is hard to get money to support workers; it is far harder to get men of the right kind.

The outlook for the Society was never before so bright. The offerings from the churches average fifty per cent. more than they did four years ago. Twelve churches support a missionary each. Individuals are giving on a larger scale than ever. Thus, one man gives $25,000, another $15,000. Others give less but make sacrifices quite as great. In the colleges there are volunteer bands. The press gives generous space to this cause. The Missionary Campaign Library is brought within reach of all. There can be no doubt as to the final issue. The banners of God never go down in defeat, and those who walk and work with him are certain of victory.

Our Budget.

-All aboard for Kansas City!

-Let us see what this "Giant of the West"

-In our next we hope to give synopses of the reports of the Home and Foreign Societies.

-We are glad to see that political excitement has not stopped the progress of religious work.

—News of good meetings comes to us from various parts of the country. There is a "sound of going in the tops of the mulberry trees."

—Let us hope that there may go out from the Kansas City Convention such an influence as will stir up all the lagging hosts and cause a general advance along the whole battle-line.

—We cannot be impressed too deeply with the fact that God's work is carried forward in the world, "not by might nor by power, but by my Spirit, saith the Lord of hosts." Let us go to the National Convention, therefore, in the spirit of prayer.

—If our National Conventions be mountain-tops from which we get broader views of the kingdom of God and its needs, and in which we rekindle the fires of devotion, they ought to be sources of spiritual power from which shall go forth revival influences that will affect the whole Church. Let us pray that the Kansas City Convention may prove to be such a means of spiritual blessing to us all.

The Bible studies in the morning, the devotional hours, the communion service on Lord's day, and all the other religious services, in connection with the reports of what the Lord hath wrought through our labors, may well serve to inspire us with larger hope, increase our faith and fill us with apostolic zeal for the world's conversion. If this shou'd be the case, we may anticipate a series of marked revivals following the National Convention throughout all the country, until thousands of souls shall be born into the kingdom, and thousands of others, faint-hearted and weak in the faith, shall be strengthened and renewed in Christian service.

—A public reception will be given the missionaries of the Foreiga Christian Missionary Society Tuesday evening, October 16th, from five to seven o'clock at the residence of T. P. Haley, 2610 Forest Ave., Kansas City, Mo. This is a happy arrangement. Thousands of friends will be glad to grasp the hands of these splendid spirits fresh from the forefront of the battle on the heathen field.

-Inasmuch as our colored brothren will hold their national conventions, including their General Christian Missionary Society, Sunday-school, Christian Endeavor and C. W. B. M. societies, at Kansas City, simultaneously with our own sessions Oct. 13-17, it is desirable that the best of feeling shall prevail between the two bodies. It would be well for some of our brethren to drop in at some of their sessions and lend all the encouragement to them we can. They have prepared a strong program and will have some fine addresses in their sessions. Among their speakers we note the names of Prof. W. E. Henderson, of Missouri, Wm. Bowen, of Kentucky, Preston Taylor, of Tennessee, Mrs. M. L. Huggard, of Missouri, Wm. Alphin, of Kansas, N. C. Calvert, of Mississippi, T. R Bayless, of Kansas, A. R. Cassius, of Indian Territory, and others whose names we cannot now mention. Of course our beloved C. C. Smith, who has had the especial care of this work for years, will be present and address the convention. The colored brethren are attempting to raise $1,000 for missionary purposes among their people this year. We hope that their sessions will be well attended and the cause of Christ greatly advanced thereby.
